INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Ce livre est le second d'une série de deux volumes qui portent sur la période du 1er janvier 1956 au 10 juin 1957, date des élections générales au cours desquelles le gouvernement libéral dirigé par le Premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent a été renversé par le Parti progressiste conservateur de John G. Diefenbaker. Bien qu'il soit évidemment impossible de diviser la période en deux volumes absolument complets et autonomes, l'éditeur et le Directeur général de la publication ont essayé de garder groupés autant que possible les documents apparentés sans trop s'écarter de l'organisation thématique qui caractérisait les volumes précédents de cette série. Il fallait en même temps, pour des raisons pratiques et budgétaires, que les deux volumes aient à peu près la même grosseur. Le premier volume, publié en juin 2001, se concentrait sur la crise de Suez et traitait du Moyen-Orient, des Nations Unies, de l'OTAN et du Commonwealth. Ce volume porte sur les relations avec les États-Unis, l'Union soviétique et l'Europe, l'Extrême-Orient, et l'Amérique latine. Il comprend des chapitres additionnels sur l'Afrique du Nord, l'énergie atomique et les relations économiques multilatérales.

Le visage changeant de la guerre froide entre l'Occident et l'Union soviétique a continué de préoccuper les décideurs canadiens pendant une bonne partie de la période étudiée dans ce volume. Ottawa a accueilli favorablement la baisse des tensions qu'annonçait la décision prise par Moscou d'instaurer une « coexistence concurrentielle » et s'est réjoui lorsque le Premier ministre soviétique, Nikita Khrouchtchev, a dénoncé Staline lors du 20e Congrès du Parti Communiste, en février 1956. « Il y a peu de doute que le mythe de Staline est en voie d'être complètement détruit » jubilait le Secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Lester B. Pearson. « À présent, le corps de Staline – tout comme le cadavre d'Oliver Cromwell, va probablement être pendu, noyé et écartelé.» [Document 537] Bien qu'intrigué par cette évolution en Union soviétique, Ottawa se méfiait encore des intentions de Moscou. Au sein du ministère des Affaires extérieures, R.A.D. Ford, qui était le chef de la Direction de l'Europe et le plus éminent soviétologue du Canada, faisait cette sinistre mise en garde : « comme les visées des Soviétiques demeurent essentiellement les mêmes, la menace que fait peser l'URSS, bien qu'elle ait changé de caractère, demeure lourde et, à certains égards, plus dangereuse que la politique purement agressive de Staline. » [Document 536]

Parfois, les autorités canadiennes hésitaient sur ce qu'il fallait faire face à cette menace différente. C'était particulièrement le cas quand il s'agissait de réagir à la présence grandissante de Moscou dans les pays en développement. R.A.D. Ford et A.E. Ritchie, qui était à la tête de la Direction économique, ne s'entendaient absolument pas sur la stratégie occidentale et canadienne à adopter pour contrer les nouvelles interventions soviétiques en Afrique et en Asie. [Document 539] En revanche, les décideurs canadiens étaient d'accord pour négocier directement avec l'Union soviétique et ses satellites d'Europe de l'Est. Ils estimaient tous qu'il était judicieux de conclure un accord commercial avec Moscou et de vendre du blé canadien à l'URSS moyennant un paiement en espèces. La plupart d'entre eux reconnaissaient aussi la nécessité de prendre la direction du programme bilatéral et d'empêcher Moscou de définir les relations. « Nous ne pouvions pas nous borner à répondre aux visites proposées par le gouvernement soviétique en l'invitant à notre tour », déclarait M. Pearson à ses collègues du Cabinet. « Nous devons prendre nous-mêmes l'initiative dans des

INTRODUCTION

This is the second of two volumes covering the period January 1, 1956 to June 10, 1957, when Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent's Liberal government was defeated in a general election by John G. Diefenbaker's Progressive Conservative Party. Although it is clearly impossible to divide the period into two completely self-contained volumes, the editor and general editor have tried to keep together as much associated material as possible without departing too much from the thematic organization that has characterized earlier volumes in this series. At the same time, practical and budgetary considerations dictated that the two volumes be roughly similar in size. The earlier volume, published in June 2001, focused on the Suez Crisis and contained material on the Middle East, the United Nations, NATO and the Commonwealth. This volume covers relations with the United States, the Soviet Union and Europe, the Far East, and Latin America. It includes additional chapters on North Africa, atomic energy, and international multilateral economic relations.

The shifting character of the Cold War confrontation with the Soviet Union continued to preoccupy Canadian policy-makers for much of the period documented in this volume. Ottawa welcomed the easing of tensions that was signalled by Moscow's pursuit of "competitive co-existence" and was pleased when Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev denounced Stalin during the 20th Communist Party Congress in February 1956. "There can be little doubt that the myth of Stalin is being completely demolished," exulted Lester B. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. "[N]ow the body of Stalin – like that of Oliver Cromwell, is, post-mortem, likely to be hanged, drawn and quartered." [Document 537] Though intrigued by these developments within the Soviet Union, Ottawa remained wary of Moscow's intentions. In the Department of External Affairs, R.A.D. Ford, the head of the European Division and Canada's foremost Soviet expert, warned grimly that "as the basic Soviet aims remain the same, the challenge from the USSR, while changed in character, remains strong and in some respects more dangerous than the nakedly aggressive policy of Stalin." [Document 536]

Canadian officials were sometimes unsure how to respond to this altered threat. This was especially true of Moscow's growing presence in the developing world. Ford and A.E. Ritchie, the head of the Economic Division, disagreed strongly over Western and Canadian strategy for countering new Soviet initiatives in Africa and Asia. [Document 539] Canadian policy-makers were united, however, when it came to dealing directly with the Soviet Union and its East European satellites. Everyone thought it sensible to conclude a trade agreement with Moscow and sell Canadian wheat to the USSR for cash. There was also broad agreement on the need to seize control of the bilateral agenda and prevent Moscow from defining the relationship. "It was not sufficient for us merely to reciprocate visits proposed by the Soviet Government," Pearson told his Cabinet colleagues. "We must take the initiative ourselves in fields of special interest to us, in order, among other things, to forestall undesirable initiatives from them." [Document 508]

More important, the relaxation of Soviet policy prompted the Department of External Affairs to conduct a comprehensive review of the government's attitude toward the satellite states of Eastern Europe. In Ford's view, Canada should no longer ostracize the satellites to keep the Soviet Union on the defensive, but engage them more actively in economic, cultural, and information exchanges. "The regimes are not going to be overthrown, so we had better concentrate our efforts on trying to make domaines qui nous intéressent particulièrement afin, entre autres, de prévenir les interventions indésirables des Soviétiques. » [Document 508]

Fait plus important, l'assouplissement de la politique soviétique a incité le ministère des Affaires extérieures à entreprendre un examen complet de la position du gouvernement à l'égard des pays satellites d'Europe de l'Est. Selon M. Ford, le Canada ne devait plus frapper d'ostracisme les satellites pour garder l'Union soviétique sur la défensive; il devait plutôt les faire participer de manière plus dynamique aux échanges économiques et culturels ainsi qu'au partage d'informations. M. Ford constatait, en juin 1956, « Les régimes ne vont pas être renversés; donc, il vaudrait mieux concentrer nos efforts pour essayer de les rendre plus acceptables à nos yeux ». « Notre politique devrait viser à encourager leur indépendance vis-à-vis de Moscou, tout en précisant clairement que nous n'avons pas d'intentions belliqueuses et que nous ne comptons absolument pas modifier radicalement leurs régimes sociaux et politiques actuels. » [Document 522]

L'Europe de l'Est, quant à elle, aspirait au changement. En automne 1956, des gouvernements communistes « nationalistes » ont vu le jour en Pologne et en Hongrie suite à l'agitation populaire qui a secoué les satellites. À la fin d'octobre, sous le regard stupéfait des habitants de la planète, des intellectuels et étudiants hongrois ont forcé les troupes soviétiques à se retirer de Budapest. La réaction de Moscou a été prompte et brutale. Les tanks et les soldats ont écrasé rapidement les rebelles mal armés et établi un gouvernement fantoche. Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Jules Léger, donnait cette explication : « L'erreur des rebelles et celle commise par [le Premier ministre Imre] Nagy pour s'être efforcé de satisfaire à leurs exigences a été d'essayer d'aller trop loin et trop vite ».[Document 463] Tandis que M. Pearson s'évertuait à faire sortir la Grande-Bretagne et la France de la situation fâcheuse dans laquelle elles se trouvaient au Moyen-Orient, le Canada se bornait à suivre l'exemple de Washington, qui consistait à condamner la conduite de Moscou en adoptant coup sur coup aux Nations Unies plusieurs résolutions, toutes aussi inutiles. Ces modestes témoignages de solidarité à l'égard du peuple hongrois, obtenus seulement au terme d'une longue querelle avec les délégations africaines et asiatiques à New York, ont déçu beaucoup de gens et leur ont donné l'impression d'avoir été trahis. « Je pense que nous devons reconnaître », concluait M. Ford, « que la démarche des Nations Unies à l'égard de la Hongrie a été dans une large mesure un échec ... On a refusé obstinément d'entendre la seule leçon utile que l'on aurait pu apprendre du groupe arabo-asiatique sur la nature du régime soviétique. » [Document 506] them more acceptable from our point of view," he observed in June 1956. "Our policy should be directed toward encouraging independence from Moscow while making it clear that we have no aggressive intentions and no intentions of radically altering their present social and political systems." [Document 522]

Pour faire face au flot de réfugiés hongrois qui se répandait dans toute l'Europe à la suite de la crise, le Canada a également fait preuve d'un manque d'imagination. Comme les documents présentés au chapitre deux l'illustrent clairement, la réaction d'Ottawa a été lente et hésitante. M. Pearson insistait pour que le gouvernement verse une somme équivalant aux fonds qui affluaient de sources nationales et internationales pour aider les réfugiés, mais il a eu du mal à surmonter les difficultés. Il a exhorté le ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration, J.W. Pickersgill, d'accepter plus de réfugiés et pressé le Cabinet d'accorder des ressources supplémentaires. Le plus souvent, toutefois, il essuyait un refus et subissait un échec. Le Cabinet hésitait à mettre à l'épreuve la capacité du pays d'absorber les réfugiés, et faisait preuve de scepticisme et de manque de solidarité à l'égard des efforts déployés par les Nations Unies en Europe.

East Europe, nevertheless, wanted change. By the fall of 1956, popular unrest in the satellites had thrown up "nationalist" Communist governments in Poland and Hungary. In late October, as the world watched in amazement, Hungarian intellectuals and students forced Soviet troops to retreat from Budapest. Moscow's response was swift and brutal. Tanks and troops quickly crushed the poorly armed rebels and installed a puppet government. "The mistake of the rebels, and of [Premier Imre] Nagy for trying to keep pace with their demands," the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Jules Léger, explained, "was in trying to go too far and too fast." [Document 463] With Pearson preoccupied with extracting Britain and France from their misadventures in the Middle East, Canada simply followed Washington's lead, condemning Moscow's behaviour by passing one futile United Nations resolution after another. These small gestures of support for the Hungarian people, which were won only after protracted struggles with the Afro-Asian delegations in New York, left many feeling bitter and betrayed. "I think we must agree," concluded Ford, "that the action of the UN on Hungary was largely a failure.... The one lesson that might profitably have been learned by the Arab-Asian group concerning the nature of the Soviet system has been obstinately refused." [Document 506]

Canada's response to the flood of Hungarian refugees that spilled across Europe in the wake of the crisis was equally uninspired. As the documents in chapter two make clear, Ottawa's reaction was slow and hesitant. Pearson insisted that the government match the outpouring of domestic and international support for the refugees but found the going tough. He urged J.W. Pickersgill, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to accept more refugees and he pressed Cabinet for additional resources. But more often than not, he was rebuffed and defeated. Cabinet hesitated to test the country's capacity to absorb the refugees, and it proved sceptical and unsupportive of UN efforts in Europe.

In contrast, Canadian policy toward Poland was more engaged and dynamic. The fate of the moderately nationalist Communist government in Poland was all the more important in view of the Soviet Union's intervention in Hungary. "The success of the Poles in establishing and maintaining a measure of independence in their internal affairs," Léger observed in late November 1956, "will provide the key to Soviet policy in Eastern Europe." Pearson agreed, and Canada set out to "wean Poland gently away from its dependence on Moscow." [Document 569] Canadian diplomats tried to normalize relations with Poland, resolve the long-standing dispute over the Polish Art Treasures, and bolster the Polish economy with much-needed financial credits.

The persistence of the Cold War meant that defence and security questions continued to dominate Canada's relations with the United States. The tensions between national and continental approaches to North American air defence, already an important theme in Volume 21, intensified sharply in 1956-57. In January 1956, Ottawa learned that Washington wanted permission to deploy nuclear weapons over Canada. A month later, the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff asked Ottawa for its views on the feasibility of fully integrating the two countries' air defence systems. General Charles Foulkes, chairman of the Chiefs of Staff, was anxious to meet American demands but En revanche, la politique canadienne à l'égard de la Pologne était plus engagée et plus dynamique. Le sort du gouvernement communiste modérément nationaliste de la Pologne prenait encore plus d'importance en raison de l'intervention de l'Union soviétique en Hongrie. À la fin de novembre 1956, M. Léger a fait remarquer :« Si les Polonais réussissent à acquérir et à conserver une certaine indépendance dans leurs affaires intérieures, ce succès déterminera la politique soviétique en Europe de l'Est. » M. Pearson était d'accord avec lui, et le Canada a entrepris de « faire cesser lentement la dépendance de la Pologne à l'égard de Moscou ». [Document 569] Les diplomates canadiens ont essayé de normaliser les relations avec la Pologne, de résoudre le différend de longue date concernant les trésors d'art polonais et de soutenir l'économie polonaise en lui offrant une aide financière dont elle avait grandement besoin.

Comme la guerre froide se poursuivait, les questions de défense et de sécurité ont continué de jouer un rôle prépondérant dans les relations entre le Canada et les États-Unis. En 1956-1957, on a observé une nette aggravation des tensions entre les approches nationales et continentales à l'égard de la défense aérienne de l'Amérique du Nord. Ce dossier constituait déjà un sujet important, examiné dans le volume 21. En janvier 1956, Ottawa a appris que Washington désirait obtenir l'autorisation de déployer des armes nucléaires au Canada. Un mois plus tard, les chefs d'état-major combinés des États-Unis ont demandé au gouvernement canadien ce qu'il pensait de la possibilité d'intégrer complètement les systèmes de défense aérienne des deux pays. Le général Charles Foulkes, chef de l'état-major interarmes, désirait vivement acquiescer à la demande des Américains, alors que les dirigeants du ministère des Affaires extérieures étaient plus prudents. L'ambassadeur du Canada à Washington, Arnold Heeney, faisait part de ces préoccupations : « Si les chefs d'état-major américains et canadiens s'entendaient sur l'intégration du contrôle opérationnel de nos systèmes de défense aérienne et sur le déploiement d'unités nucléaires américaines au Canada, je me demande si le gouvernement serait aussi libre qu'il devrait l'être pour prendre des décisions bien fondées. » [Document 22]

Le débat entre diplomates et militaires s'est poursuivi de façon latente au cours de l'été et de l'automne 1956 avant que le Cabinet ne consente à contrecoeur au déploiement d'armes nucléaires américaines assorti des garanties voulues. Le ministère des Affaires extérieures insistait aussi sur la nécessité de maintenir la position canadienne au sein de tout système intégré de défense continentale. M. Léger avançait ces arguments : « La géographie et notre volonté de collaborer efficacement aux efforts communs de défense continentale nous confèrent un droit spécial d'exiger des consultations plus poussées. » [Document 46] Le Ministère voulait également profiter de l'intérêt que les Américains portaient à la défense continentale pour préciser les obligations qui incombaient à Washington de consulter son allié de plus petite taille et, en fin de compte, il a contraint le ministère de la Défense nationale à adopter cette position en février 1957. [Document 47] Le compromis a duré tout le printemps, mais après la défaite électorale subie par le gouvernement en juin, le Cabinet à refusé d'agir et laissé au nouveau ministère le soin d'examiner ce dossier. [Document 51]

La présence militaire croissante des Américains au Canada éveillait de plus en plus la méfiance des ministres. L'un d'eux a signalé au Cabinet qu' « il était regrettable que de plus en plus de troupes américaines soient stationnées dans des bases situées sur le officials in the Department of External Affairs were more cautious. "If the United States and Canadian Chiefs of Staff should agree on an integrated operational control of our air defences and the deployment of U.S. atomic units in Canada," worried Arnold Heeney, Canada's ambassador to Washington, "I wonder whether the Government would be as free as it should be to take decisions on the merits?" [Document 22]

The debate between the diplomats and the military simmered during the summer and fall of 1956 before Cabinet reluctantly agreed in January 1957 to accept American nuclear weapons with appropriate safeguards. The Department of External Affairs also insisted on safeguarding Canada's position in any integrated continental defence system. "Geography and our willingness to cooperate effectively in joint continental defence efforts," Léger argued, "give us a special right to demand closer consultation." [Document 46] The Department wanted to use the American interest in continental defence to detail Washington's obligations to consult its smaller ally, a position it finally forced on the Department of National Defence in February 1957. [Document 47] The compromise held up through the spring, but when the government was defeated in the June election, Cabinet declined to act and left the matter for the new ministry. [Document 51]

Ministers were increasingly wary of the growing American military presence in Canada. "It was unfortunate," one pointed out in Cabinet "that more and more U.S. forces were being stationed at bases on Canadian soil." [Document 115] Canadians too wondered about the costs and benefits of the close postwar security arrangements with the United States. In the spring of 1957, a U.S. Senate subcommittee on internal security revived the unsubstantiated charges of Communist subversion against Herbert Norman, Canada's Ambassador to Egypt. Acutely distressed at these renewed allegations, Norman committed suicide on April 4, 1957, igniting a firestorm of anti-American protest in Canada. The pressure on Pearson, who told Heeney that he "had never experienced an atmosphere so critical of the United States on all sides of the House of Commons and throughout the country," was intense. [Document 63] Ottawa protested in the strongest terms and sought firm assurances that any confidential information about Canadian citizens supplied to the United States would remain secret. When none was forthcoming, Ottawa threatened to cancel existing arrangements for the bilateral exchange of security information.

A growing number of increasingly testy economic issues also crowded the bilateral agenda in 1956-57. Canadian ministers and their officials continued to worry about Washington's aggressive use of the ill-famed Public Law 480 to sell heavily subsidized American wheat into Canadian markets. They also fretted about unrelenting Congressional demands for import restrictions on groundfish, oil, and alsike clover. Ottawa reacted with exceptional vigour when the White House decided to increase the tariff on lead and zinc, "a most serious breech in the determination of the administration to resist pressures for protection on important items for international trade." [Document 235]

The St. Laurent government was not deaf to the pleas for help from its own domestic interests. The 1956 budget, for instance, introduced controversial measures designed to protect the small Canadian magazine industry from American competition, prompting a sharp exchange of views with Washington. Cabinet was quick to help Premium Iron Ores Limited deal with its American tax problems, anxious to counter territoire canadien ». Les Canadiens se demandaient eux aussi quels étaient les coûts et les avantages des accords de l'après-guerre qui resserraient la coopération avec les États-Unis en matière de sécurité. Au printemps 1957, un sous-comité sénatorial américain chargé de la sécurité intérieure a renouvelé les accusations non fondées de subversion communiste portées contre l'ambassadeur du Canada en Egypte, Herbert Norman. Accablé par ces nouvelles allégations, M. Norman s'est suicidé le 4 avril 1957, ce qui a soulevé au Canada une tempête de protestations contre les États-Unis. Des pressions intenses s'exerçaient sur M. Pearson, qui a déclaré à M. Heeney qu'il « n'avais jamais observé une attitude aussi critique à l'égard des États-Unis de la part de tous les députés de la Chambre des communes et dans tout le pays ». [Document 63] Ottawa a protesté énergiquement et a demandé des garanties formelles assurant que toute information confidentielle concernant des citoyens canadiens fournie aux États-Unis demeurerait secrète. N'obtenant pas de réponse à cette requête, le gouvernement canadien a menacé de rompre les accords existants relatifs à l'échange bilatéral de renseignements sur la sécurité.

De plus, un nombre croissant d'épineuses questions économiques surchargeaient le programme bilatéral en 1956-1957. Les ministres canadiens et leurs fonctionnaires étaient encore préoccupés par l'attitude de Washington qui brandissait la funeste Public Law 480 pour vendre du blé américain fortement subventionné sur les marchés canadiens. Les requêtes incessantes du Congrès en vue d'imposer des restrictions à l'importation de poisson de fond, d'huile et de graine de trèfle d'alsike les irritaient également. Ottawa a réagi avec une vigueur exceptionnelle lorsque la Maison-Blanche a décidé de hausser les droits de douane sur le plomb et le zinc, « un manquement extrêmement grave à la résolution prise par l'administration de résister aux pressions afin de protéger d'importants produits destinés au commerce international ». [Document 235]

Le gouvernement Saint-Laurent n'est pas resté sourd aux appels à l'aide pour défendre ses propres intérêts nationaux. Par exemple, le budget de 1956, instaurait des mesures controversées destinées à protéger les intérêts de la petite industrie canadienne de la publication de magazines contre la concurrence américaine, mesures qui ont suscité un échange de propos très vifs entre Ottawa et Washington. Le Cabinet a aidé rapidement Premium Iron Ores Limited à résoudre ses problèmes fiscaux avec les Américains, car il était pressé de démentir « l'impression assez répandue que le gouvernement canadien ne s'intéressait pas au traitement infligé par le gouvernement des États-Unis à une entreprise canadienne ». [Document 199] À l'aube des élections fédérales de juin 1957, les appels adressés à Ottawa ont été plus vibrants, et le gouvernement libéral y a répondu en prenant des mesures pour protéger les dindes ainsi que les fruits et les légumes canadiens contre la concurrence des voisins du Sud.

Comme toujours, les décideurs canadiens et américains ont dû s'occuper à régler les questions transfrontalières. Les progrès rapides en vue de l'ouverture de la Voie maritime du Saint-Laurent ont été compromis au début de 1956 lorsqu'est survenu un différend majeur parce qu'Ottawa voulait garder sa liberté d'étendre la Voie maritime sur le territoire canadien sans le consentement des Américains. La détermination d'Ottawa de retarder le projet pour parvenir à ses fins a, en définitive, persuadé Washington de battre en retraite, quoiqu'à regret et de mauvaise grâce. Le débat sur l'avenir du Peace Bridge, reliant Fort Erie, en Ontario, à Buffalo, dans l'État de New York, a également été marqué par des négociations bilatérales tout aussi laborieuses.

"the rather widespread impression that the Canadian Government was not taking an interest in the treatment being given by the U.S. Government to a Canadian firm." [Document 199] As the June 1957 federal election approached, the demands on Ottawa grew louder, and the Liberal government responded with measures to protect Canadian turkeys, fruits and vegetables from southern competition.

As always, transboundary questions kept policy-makers busy on both sides of the border. Speedy progress on the St. Lawrence Seaway was jeopardized in early 1956 when fundamental differences arose over Ottawa's determination to retain its freedom to expand the Seaway in Canadian territory without American consent. Ottawa's willingness to delay the project to achieve its purpose eventually persuaded Washington to retreat – albeit reluctantly and ungraciously. Equally difficult bilateral negotiations characterized discussions over the future of the Peace Bridge, which joined Fort Erie, Ontario, with Buffalo, New York. The documents reprinted here offer a rare illustration of the interaction between local Members of Parliament, Cabinet ministers, and federal bureaucrats in determining policy.

The most important continental resource issue covered in this volume is undoubtedly the government's new policy toward the development of rivers flowing across the Canada-U.S. border. In February 1956, after years of fruitless debate in the International Joint Commission on the future of the Columbia River system, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Jean Lesage, proposed direct talks with Washington at the political and diplomatic levels. These, he hoped, would determine new principles for sharing the upstream and downstream benefits of all rivers crossing the international border. To Ottawa's evident delight, United States President Dwight Eisenhower accepted the proposal, which St. Laurent advanced during his visit to White Sulphur Springs in March 1956. The talks themselves started slowly, and much of the material reprinted here records the struggle to define the scope of the negotiations and reach an agreed position with British Columbia's argumentative premier, W.A.C. Bennett.

Economic questions also dominated Canada's relations with Western Europe, where the emergence of the Common Market and British proposals for a European Free Trade Area represented a formidable challenge. Pearson, deeply influenced by the views of Belgian Foreign Minister Paul-Henri Spaak, emphasized the political benefits for the Western alliance of closer integration in Europe and discounted the economic costs to Canada. The Minister of Finance, Walter Harris, and his ally, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, C.D. Howe, took a more hardheaded view, and were unprepared to welcome either the Common Market or the proposed European Free Trade Area. But Pearson carried the Prime Minister with him against these two formidable opponents, and in the end, Canada's attitude to developments in Europe was not unsympathetic.

A similar lack of enthusiasm characterized Canada's approach to other European institutions. In the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), Canada remained an aloof and reluctant participant in the organization's program for trade liberalization. Louis Rasminsky, Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada, explained that Canada preferred broadly based institutions like the World Bank or the GATT. Canadian policy in the OEEC, he quipped, might be summed up thus:

Les documents reproduits ici donnent un exemple rare qui illustre l'interaction entre les députés de la région, les ministres du Cabinet et les fonctionnaires fédéraux dans la définition de la politique.

Dans ce volume, le principal dossier relatif aux ressources continentales est incontestablement l'instauration par le gouvernement de la nouvelle politique d'aménagement des rivières traversant la frontière entre le Canada et les États-Unis. En février 1956, après des années de discussion stérile au sein de la Commission mixte internationale sur l'avenir du bassin du Columbia, le ministre du Nord et des Ressources nationales, Jean Lesage, a proposé de négocier directement avec Washington aux niveaux politique et diplomatique. Il espérait que ces pourparlers permettraient de définir de nouveaux principes pour partager les avantages d'amont et d'aval qui découleraient de la mise en valeur de toutes les rivières traversant la frontière internationale. À la joie manifeste d'Ottawa, le président des États-Unis, Dwight Eisenhower, a accepté la proposition que M. Saint-Laurent lui avait faite lors de sa visite à White Sulphur Springs, en mars 1956. Les pourparlers proprement dits ont démarré lentement, et la plupart des documents reproduits ici décrivent les efforts en vue de définir la portée des négociations et de convenir d'une position commune avec le premier ministre batailleur de la Colombie-Britannique, W.A.C. Bennett.

Les questions économiques ont également joué un rôle prépondérant dans les relations entre le Canada et l'Europe occidentale, où la création du Marché commun et les propositions de la Grande-Bretagne en vue d'établir une Zone européenne de libre-échange posaient un formidable défi. M. Pearson, fortement influencé par les opinions du ministre des Affaires étrangères de la Belgique, Paul-Henri Spaak, a souligné les avantages politiques que présentait l'intégration accrue des pays européens pour l'alliance occidentale, tout en faisant peu de cas des coûts qu'elle entraînerait pour l'économie du Canada. Le ministre des Finances, Walter Harris, et son allié, le ministre du Commerce, C.D. Howe, ont adopté une position plus intransigeante, et n'étaient pas prêts à accueillir le Marché commun ou la Zone européenne de libre-échange. M. Pearson a toutefois fait peser son poids de premier ministre contre ces deux adversaires redoutables et, en définitive, le Canada n'était pas opposé à l'évolution de la situation en Europe.

Ce manque d'enthousiasme a également marqué la démarche du Canada à l'égard d'autres institutions européennes. Au sein de l'Organisation pour la coopération économique européenne (OEEC), le Canada est demeuré un participant réservé et peu disposé à s'engager dans le programme de libéralisation du commerce mis sur pied par l'organisation. Louis Rasminsky, sous-gouverneur de la Banque du Canada, a précisé que le Canada préférait les institutions de grande envergure comme la Banque mondiale ou le GATT. Il a déclaré d'un ton sarcastique que la politique canadienne au sein de l'OEEC pouvait donc se résumer comme suit :

Tu ne tueras point, mais tu n'auras pas besoin d'essayer officieusement de rester en vie. [Document 406]

Le Canada adoptait une attitude plus hostile à l'égard de l'Intergovernmental Conference on European Migration (ICEM), qui contribuait à organiser l'afflux d'immigrants en provenance de l'Europe de l'Ouest vers le Canada, l'Australie et l'Amérique du Sud. Malgré le solide appui dont l'ICEM jouissait parmi les alliés du Canada en Europe de l'Ouest, le ministère de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration tenait à détruire cette organisation qui, de l'avis de certains responsables de l'Immigration,

Thou shalt not kill, but needst not strive
Officiously to keep alive. [Document 406]

Canada's attitude to the Intergovernmental Conference on European Migration (ICEM), which helped organize the orderly flow of migrants from Western Europe to Canada, Australia and South America, was more malevolent. Despite the ICEM's strong support among Canada's allies in Western Europe, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration was anxious to destroy the organization, which some Immigration officials thought favoured Australia. External Affairs was hopeful that its European representatives could marshal enough evidence to change Canadian policy, provided they used their "ingenuity, circumspection and some finesse." [Document 406]

In the Far East, Canada remained deeply involved in overseeing the uncertain peace in Indochina. Despite their imperfections, and there were many, Pearson concluded in early 1956 that the three International Commissions for Supervision and Control (ICSC) in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia remained the principal bulwarks "against a blowup in Indochina of the kind that could suddenly produce a major war." [Document 613] As France prepared to complete its withdrawal from Vietnam, Canada resolved to remain on the ICSC, convince Saigon to assume responsibility for the cease-fire arrangements, and reassure the sceptical Indians that the Commission would continue to function.

With Canadian support, the Commission weathered the succession crisis during the spring of 1956, before resuming its work investigating cease-fire violations by North and South Vietnam. Increasingly frustrated by Hanoi's ability to manipulate the ICSC, Canada sought more and more to restore a balance to the Commission's activities. It worked closely with South Vietnamese authorities to limit Saigon's exposure to Commission investigations into their infringement of "democratic freedoms." The Canadian Commissioner in Vietnam, Bruce Williams, eventually campaigned for the elimination of Commission outposts in North Vietnam in order to "dispel the illusion that arms control was effective." [Document 677]

Though the Commissions worked much better in Cambodia and Laos, Ottawa still found peace-keeping dangerous and burdensome. India vigorously opposed repeated Canadian efforts to wind up the Commission in Cambodia, where it had long since finished its work. As a result, relations with New Delhi and its mercurial diplomatic gadfly, Krishna Menon, suffered. In Laos, Ottawa welcomed efforts by Communist and non-Communist factions to resolve their differences through negotiations, but was disturbed to discover that Washington did not. "[B]y obstructing the desire for reunification of their country which we think is almost unanimously held by Laotians," Léger observed presciently, "we might eventually tend to drive them from the pro-Western into a strictly neutral or even anti-Western position." [Document 734]

Tired and easily irritated by the burdens of government, Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent played a diminished role in the elaboration of foreign policy during the period covered in this volume. Nevertheless, he was actively involved in several important economic questions. He used his warm relationship with Eisenhower on several occasions to seek White House support for Canadian industries harmed by American subsidies and trade restrictions. He also played an important role in defining Canada's attitude toward the European Common Market.

favorisait l'Australie. Le ministère des Affaires extérieures espérait que ses représentants en Europe pourraient recueillir assez de preuves pour modifier la politique canadienne, à condition de faire preuve d'« ingéniosité, de circonspection et d'une certaine finesse ». [Document 406]

En Extrême-Orient, le Canada demeurait profondément engagé dans la surveillance d'un processus de paix aléatoire en Indochine. Au début de 1956, M. Pearson a conclu que les trois Commissions internationales pour la surveillance et le contrôle au Vietnam, au Laos et au Cambodge (CISC) restaient, malgré leurs nombreuses imperfections, les principaux remparts « contre une explosion en Indochine qui risquerait de déclencher soudainement une guerre majeure ». [Document 613] Alors que la France se préparait à terminer le retrait de ses forces du Vietnam, le Canada a décidé de rester membre de la CISC au Vietnam pour convaincre Saïgon d'assumer la responsabilité des accords de cessez-le-feu et rassurer l'Inde, qui en doutait, que la Commission continuerait de fonctionner.

Avec l'aide du Canada, la Commission a survécu à la crise de succession survenue au printemps 1956, avant de reprendre son travail qui consistait à enquêter sur les violations du cessez-le-feu par les Nord-Vietnamiens et les Sud-Vietnamiens. De plus en plus frustré par l'aptitude de Hanoï à manipuler la CISC, le Canada s'est efforcé toujours davantage de rétablir un équilibre dans les activités de la Commission. Il a travaillé en étroite collaboration avec les autorités sud-vietnamiennes afin que les informations divulguées à Saïgon se bornent aux enquêtes de la Commission relatives aux violations des « libertés démocratiques » commises par le gouvernement de Saïgon. Le délégué canadien au Vietnam, Bruce Williams, a ensuite fait campagne pour l'élimination des postes isolés de la Commission au Nord-Vietnam afin de « dissiper l'illusion que le contrôle des armements était efficace ». [Document 677]

Bien que les Commissions aient beaucoup mieux fonctionné au Cambodge et au Laos, Ottawa estimait encore que les opérations de maintien de la paix étaient dangereuses et onéreuses. L'Inde s'est opposée vigoureusement aux efforts répétés du Canada en vue de faire cesser les activités de la Commission au Cambodge, où elle avait terminé son travail depuis longtemps. Les relations avec New Delhi et son diplomate Krishna Menon, d'humeur changeante mais toujours prêt à critiquer, ont souffert de ces tensions. Au Laos, Ottawa a accueilli favorablement les efforts déployés par les factions communistes et non communistes afin de régler leurs différends par la voie de négociations, mais il a été troublé d'apprendre que Washington n'avait eu la même réaction. M. Léger a observé avec prescience : « En faisant obstacle au désir de réunification de leur pays qui, à notre avis, anime presque tous les Laotiens, nous pourrions ultérieurement les détourner de leur position favorable à l'Occident et les inciter à adopter une position strictement neutre, voire opposée à l'Occident. » [Document 734]

Fatigué et vite irrité par les charges administratives, le Premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent a joué un rôle moins important dans l'élaboration de la politique étrangère pendant la période étudiée dans ce volume. Néanmoins, il a participé à l'examen de plusieurs dossiers économiques importants. À plusieurs reprises, il s'est servi de ses relations cordiales avec le président Eisenhower pour demander à la Maison-Blanche d'aider des industries canadiennes frappées par les restrictions commerciales et les subventions américaines. En outre, il a fortement contribué à définir la position du Canada à l'égard du Marché commun européen.

Pearson remained the most important member of the government's foreign policy team. In his absence, Paul Martin, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, continued to represent him in Cabinet and abroad. In the fall of 1956, Martin toured South Asia and Indochina, an experience that affected him deeply and long influenced his view of Asian Communism. [Document 673] Other ministers with notable foreign policy responsibilities included Ralph Campney, the Minister of National Defence, C.D. Howe, the powerful Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Walter Harris, the Minister of Finance, and a leading contender in the undeclared race to succeed St. Laurent.

During his final 18 months as Secretary of State for External Affairs, Pearson was able to draw on the advice of the experienced group of senior officials with whom he had worked closely for years. Jules Léger stayed on as Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, assisted by his deputy, R.M. Macdonnell. There were, however, important changes at the assistant under-secretarial level. In late 1955, W.D. Matthews, the Minister to Sweden and Finland, was promoted to Assistant Under-Secretary. In June 1956, John Watkins returned from his post as Ambassador to the Soviet Union and was appointed Assistant Under-Secretary to replace Jean Chapdelaine, who took over from Matthews as Minister to Sweden and Finland. In December 1956, Marcel Cadieux became Assistant Under-Secretary and Legal Advisor in place of Max Wershof, who went to Geneva as Permanent Representative to the European Office of the United Nations. And finally, in April 1957, Douglas LePan, who had finished his work as Secretary to the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects, was promoted to Assistant Under-Secretary. John Holmes alone remained an Assistant Under-Secretary throughout the period covered in this volume.

There was no change in representation at Canada's major posts abroad until late in the spring of 1957. Dana Wilgress remained Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council and Representative to the Organization for European Economic Co-operation. Norman A. Robertson stayed in London as High Commissioner to the United Kingdom until May 1957, when he replaced Arnold Heeney in Washington as Ambassador to the United States. Heeney returned to Ottawa as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. Georges Vanier continued as Ambassador to France.

Like other recent volumes in this series, Volume 23 is based primarily on the records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office. These were supplemented where necessary by the private papers of Cabinet ministers and senior officials, and the files of the Departments of National Defence, Finance, Citizenship and Immigration, and Trade and Commerce. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the files of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the archival sources consulted in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxvii.

The selection of documents is guided by the general principles outlined in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), as amended in the Introduction to Volume 20 (p. xxiii). In short, the series tries to provide a "self-contained record of the major foreign policy decisions taken by the Government of Canada," by concentrating on Canada's most important bilateral and multilateral relationships and on the major international issues that directly involved Cabinet members in substantive policy decisions.

M. Pearson est demeuré le principal membre de l'équipe gouvernementale chargée de formuler la politique étrangère. En son absence, le ministre de la Santé nationale et du Bien-être social, Paul Martin, continuait de le représenter au sein du Cabinet et à l'étranger. Au cours de l'automne 1956, M. Martin, a effectué une visite en Asie du Sud et en Indochine. Ce voyage l'a profondément marqué et a longtemps influencé son opinion sur le communisme asiatique. [Document 673] Parmi les autres ministres dotés d'importantes responsabilités en matière de politique étrangère figuraient Ralph Campney, le ministre de la Défense nationale, C.D. Howe, le puissant ministre du Commerce, ainsi que Walter Harris, ministre des Finances et principal candidat dans la course non officielle pour la succession de M. Saint-Laurent.

Au cours des dix-huit derniers mois de son mandat de secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, M. Pearson a pu tirer parti des conseils du groupe de hauts fonctionnaires expérimentés avec lesquels il travaillait en étroite collaboration depuis des années. Jules Léger continuait d'exercer les fonctions de sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, avec l'aide de son adjoint, R.M. Macdonnell. Il y a eu toutefois des changements importants au niveau des sous-secrétaires adjoints. À la fin de 1955, W.D. Matthews, ministre auprès de la Suède et de la Finlande, a été promu sous-secrétaire adjoint En juin 1956, John Watkins est rentré de son affectation comme ambassadeur en Union soviétique et a été nommé sous-secrétaire adjoint en remplacement de Jean Chapdelaine qui a succédé à Matthews comme ministre auprès de la Suède et de la Finlande. En décembre 1956, Marcel Cadieux est devenu sous-secrétaire adjoint et jurisconsulte à la place de Max Wershof qui est devenu représentant permanent à Genève auprès de l'Office européen des Nations Unies. Et finalement, en avril 1957, Douglas LePan qui avait terminé son travail de secrétaire auprès de la Commission royale d'enquête sur les perspectives économiques du Canada a été promu au poste de sous-secrétaire adjoint. Seul John Holmes est demeuré sous-secrétaire adjoint pendant toute la période couverte par le présent volume.

Jusqu'à la fin du printemps 1957, il n'y a eu aucun changement dans la représentation du Canada dans les principales missions à l'étranger. Dana Wilgress demeurait aux postes de représentante permanente du Canada auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord et de représentante auprès de l'Organisation pour la coopération économique européenne. Norman A. Robertson était resté à Londres en qualité de Haut-commissaire du Canada en Grande-Bretagne jusqu'en mai 1957, lorsqu'il avait remplacé Arnold Heeney au poste d'ambassadeur à Washington. M. Heeney est retourné à Ottawa pour devenir président de la Commission de la Fonction publique. Georges Vanier est demeuré à son poste d'Ambassadeur du Canada en France.

Comme les autres volumes de cette série publiés récemment, le volume 23 repose surtout sur les dossiers du ministère des Affaires étrangères et du Bureau du Conseil privé. Au besoin, ils ont été étoffés par des documents privés appartenant à des ministres du Cabinet et à des hauts fonctionnaires, ainsi que par des dossiers des ministères de la Défense nationale, des Finances, de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration, et du Commerce. Pour préparer ce volume, j'ai pu avoir complètement accès aux dossiers du ministère des Affaires étrangères et largement accès à d'autres collections. Une liste complète des archives consultées pour la préparation de ce volume est présentée à la page xxvii.

Les documents sont choisis conformément aux principes généraux définis dans l'Introduction au volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), tels que modifiés dans l'Introduction au volume

The editorial devices used in this volume remain those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (+) indicates a Canadian document that has not been printed. Editorial excisions are shown by an ellipse (...). The phrase "group corrupt" indicates decryption problems in the transmission of the original telegram. Words and passages that were struck out by the author, marginal notes and distribution lists are reproduced as footnotes only when important. Unless otherwise indicated, it is assumed that documents have been read by the addressee. Proper and place names are standardized. The editor has silently corrected spelling, punctuation and capitalization, as well as transcription errors whose meaning is clear from their context. All other editorial additions to the documents are indicated by the use of square brackets. Documents are reprinted in either English or French, depending on their language of origin.

The preparation of this volume was a collective effort. The Historical Section continues to depend on the expertise of the National Archives of Canada for help in locating relevant records. Paulette Dozois, David Smith and Robert McIntosh of the Government Archives Division responded quickly and cheerfully to requests for help. Maureen Hoogenraad of the Manuscript Division was equally helpful. Ciuineas Boyle, Access to Information Co-ordinator at the Privy Council Office, and her colleague, Herb Barrett, facilitated access to Cabinet records for the period. Corrinne Miller, archivist at the Bank of Canada, was indispensable in dealing with that collection.

Michael Rasminsky and Andrew Coyne kindly granted permission to reprint material from their fathers' collections. My overseas colleagues, Heather Yasamee and Keith Hamilton of the Records and Historical Services, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, helped arrange for the declassification of several important British documents. William Burr of the National Security Archive, Washington, D.C., was also helpful in this regard. Mark Hayes of the Naval Historical Center in Washington, Marijke van Faassen of the Institute of Netherlands History, David S. Patterson of the Office of the Historian, United States Department of State, and Kunihiro Haraguchi of the Diplomatic Record Office, Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Japan, identified some of the individuals in the List of Persons.

Ted Kelly helped research parts of this volume and guided it through production with diligence. Christopher Cook, whose knowledge of the archival collections reflected in this volume is unrivalled, remained my main research assistant. He was ably assisted at times by Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette, and Tina McLauchlan. Michael Stevenson also contributed research for several sections in this volume and compiled the index. As always, it was a pleasure to work with this team of fine historians.

Don Barry, Hector Mackenzie and Norman Hillmer, former editors of this series, offered advice and encouragement. My colleague, Mary Halloran, provided good-humoured support. The general editor of this series, John Hilliker, carefully reviewed the whole manuscript, and played a major role in helping to define the scope of this volume as well as its predecessor. The series would not be possible without the support of the director of the Outreach Programs and e-Communications Division, Roger Bélanger, and his predecessor, Gaston Barban. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

Les formules de rédaction utilisées dans ce volume sont les mêmes que celles qui sont décrites dans l'Introduction au volume 9 (p. xix). Une croix (+) désigne un document canadien inédit. Les modifications rédactionnelles sont indiquées par une ellipse (...). L'expression « group corrupt » signale des problèmes de déchiffrement dans la transmission du télégramme original. Les mots et les passages biffés par l'auteur, les notes marginales et les listes de distribution ne sont reproduits sous forme de renvois en bas de page que lorsqu'ils sont importants. Sauf indication contraire, on suppose que les documents ont été lus par leur destinataire. Les noms propres et géographiques ont été normalisés. L'éditeur a corrigé sans se plaindre l'orthographe, la ponctuation et la mise en majuscules, ainsi que les erreurs de transcription dont il est facile de saisir le sens grâce au contexte. Tous les autres ajouts rédactionnels apportés aux documents sont indiqués par des crochets. Les documents sont reproduits en français ou en anglais selon la langue utilisée dans l'original.

La préparation de ce volume est le fruit d'efforts concertés. La Section historique reste tributaire de l'aide que lui fournissent les experts des Archives nationales du Canada pour rechercher les documents pertinents. Paulette Dozois, David Smith et Robert McIntosh de la Division des archives gouvernementales ont répondu rapidement et avec entrain aux demandes d'aide. Maureen Hoogenraad, de la Division des manuscrits, nous a également prêté main-forte. Ciuineas Boyle, coordonnatrice de l'accès à l'information au Bureau du Conseil privé, ainsi que son collègue, Herb Barrett, nous ont facilité l'accès aux dossiers du Cabinet portant sur la période visée. En outre, l'aide de Corrinne Miller, archiviste à la Banque du Canada, a été indispensable pour dépouiller cette collection.

Michael Rasminsky et Andrew Coyne ont eu la bonté de nous autoriser à reproduire des documents en provenance des collections de leur père. Mes collègues travaillant à l'étranger, Heather Yasamee et Keith Hamilton (Records and Historical Services, Foreign and Commonwealth Office), ont contribué au travail de déclassification de plusieurs documents britanniques importants. William Burr de National Security Archive, à Washington D.C., nous a également aidés à nous acquitter de cette tâche. Mark Hayes du Naval Historical Center, à Washington, Marijke van Faassen de l'Institute of Netherlands History, David S. Patterson de l'Office of the Historian, au Département d'État des É.-U., et Kunihiro Haraguchi des Archives diplomatiques, au ministère des Affaires étrangères du Japon, nous ont fournis des renseignements utilisés dans la Liste des personnes.

Ted Kelly a contribué au travail de recherche pour ce volume et il l'a dirigé en produisant assidûment des résultats. Christopher Cook, doté d'une connaissance insurpassable des collections d'archives, qui transparaît d'ailleurs dans ce volume, est demeuré mon principal assistant à la recherche. Parfois, il a été secondé avec compétence par Joseph McHattie, Nelson Joannette et Tina McLauchlan. Michael Stevenson a également participé aux recherches pour plusieurs chapitres de ce volume, et il a dressé l'index. Comme toujours, il a été agréable de travailler avec cette équipe d'excellents historiens.

The Historical Section provided the supplementary text and coordinated the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélineau. The Translation Bureau supplied the French for most of the footnotes, the captions and ancillary texts. My colleague in the Communications Services Division, Francine Fournier, generously shared her knowledge of the finer points of French grammar; Martha Bowers graciously helped with the English. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin proofread the entire manuscript and helped compose the List of Persons.

My wife, Mary, and my children, Katherine, Michael and Stephen continued to support me through this project in countless and delightful ways. I thank them.

GREG DONAGHY

Don Barry, Hector Mackenzie et Norman Hillmer, les anciens éditeurs de cette série, nous ont offert des conseils et des encouragements. Ma collègue, Mary Halloran, nous a soutenus par sa bonne humeur. Le Directeur général de la publication de la présente série, John Hilliker, a examiné minutieusement tout le manuscrit et joué un rôle important dans la définition de la portée de ce volume et de ceux qui l'ont précédé. La production de cette série aurait été impossible sans le concours du directeur de la Division des programmes de sensibilisation et des communications électroniques, Roger Bélanger, et de son prédécesseur Gaston Barban. Je demeure le seul responsable du choix définitif des documents figurant dans ce volume.

La Section historique a produit les annexes et coordonné la préparation technique du volume. Aline Gélineau a tapé et formaté le manuscrit. Le Bureau de la traduction a fourni la version française de la plupart des renvois en bas de page, des légendes et des annexes. Ma collègue de la Direction des services des communications, Francine Fournier, m'a offert généreusement de partager sa connaissance des subtilités de la grammaire française. Martha Bowers a accepté de bonne grâce de m'aider pour le texte anglais. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin a effectué la correction d'épreuves de l'ensemble du manuscrit et a aidé à dresser la Liste des personnalités.

Enfin, je remercie mon épouse, Mary, et mes enfants, Katherine, Michael et Stephen, qui m'ont sans cesse appuyé, de multiples façons et avec joie, tout au long de ce travail.

VISITE DU PREMIER MINISTRE SAINT-LAURENT À WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, LE 26-27 MARS 1956
VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER ST-LAURENT TO WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, MARCH 26-27, 1956

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

PROPOSED MEETING IN WASHINGTON: CANADA, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

You may recall that President Eisenhower last October proposed a meeting in Washington to be held this Spring with the President of Mexico and yourself to discuss generally continental affairs. At that time you agreed, "en principe", to attend the meeting, subject to confirmation at a later date when more would be known about the President's health and your own timetable.

The United States confirmation has arrived. Mr. Heeney reports (his telegram no. 118† is attached) that President Eisenhower would like to invite you and President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico to make a visit of approximately two and a half days, from Monday, March 26, to Wednesday, March 28, inclusive. You would leave Washington at your own convenience on Thursday. A suggested programme is included in Mr. Heeney's telegram.

Mr. Heeney had dinner with Mr. Dulles last night and they discussed the proposed meeting. Mr. Heeney has the definite impression that the idea of such a meeting did not originate with the State Department but with the President personally. He also believes that if the dates suggested in the attached telegram do not suit you it might be possible to have them changed, although the President of Mexico would also have to be free at any new time you might wish to suggest. This being an initiative of the President makes the decision more complicated. As you know, Mr. Eisenhower came to Ottawa in December 1953 while your last visit to Washington was in May 1953.[1]

The proposal for a tripartite meeting has a number of disadvantages. As formal visits of the Canadian Prime Minister to Washington recently have occurred only every two or three years, it is unfortunate that the proposed visit should take place in the rather artificial framework of North American continental affairs. Because of the participation of the Mexicans this visit could tend to take on more of a ceremonial character and less of a general exchange of views than we would hope for. Mr. Heeney pointed out, however, that the President might be interested in suggesting that the meeting be held outside Washington, perhaps in some Army post. This would be much more informal and possibly conducive to a more relaxed atmosphere.

I think that the invitation could be refused; on the other hand, because of President Eisenhower's personal interest in the matter, it is rather difficult to suggest that you do so. If you accept I think we should emphasize that the number and intimacy of Canadian and United States common interests suggest that an opportunity be given for you to have some private conversations with the President.

If you decide to accept, a telegram to Mr. Heeney is attached for your approval instructing him to assure Mr. Dulles that you will be glad to accept the President's formal invitation as soon as it is convened.

Mr. Heeney notes that the invitation includes me and assumes that I shall accompany you. I would be delighted to do that, particularly in view of the fact that Mr. Dulles, if the present dates are satisfactory, would have just returned from his tour to the Far East.

AND PRESIDENT OF MEXICO

Would you please assure Mr. Dulles that the Prime Minister will be happy to accept the President's invitation to visit Washington in March, jointly with the President of Mexico.

2. We feel no enthusiasm for the tripartite aspect of the visit. However, if the President and Mr. Dulles have their minds set on this meeting, as is evident from your telegram and subsequent telephone conversation, we have no option but to accept gracefully and go through with it.

3. In conveying the Prime Minister's willingness to accept the invitation, you might, however, point out that there are some disadvantages from the Canadian point of view in the proposed tripartite meeting, and that the present formula should not be invoked as a precedent in future years. Because of the presence of the Mexicans, I fear that the visit will tend to be largely ceremonial in character without the opportunities for a frank exchange of views which we particularly value. Canadian-American relations are so numerous and so intimate that we feel that consultations should normally be bilateral in character, when they do not take place in an international body such as NATO or the United Nations.

4. In order to avoid or at least reduce the ceremonial character of a meeting of this sort if held in Washington, you might wish to explore further with Mr. Dulles the possibility that the meeting or part of it be held outside Washington if that suited the President. This would allow Mr. St-Laurent to talk in a relaxed and informal way with the President. Possibly the ceremonial aspects of the joint visit could be reduced to a minimum; since the Mexican President is a Head of State it is likely that honours will have to be paid to him over and above those to the Prime Minister. With the undoubted good faith and good intentions of the United States, the ceremonial arrangements could possibly develop in a way that could be misunderstood here and this should be avoided.

5. One way to help minimize the ceremonial aspect, and I shall be grateful if you will explore this, would be to separate the respective arrivals and departures by one day. So far as mere timing is concerned the Prime Minister does not really care whether he arrives Sunday or Monday. But, if he were to arrive Sunday and the Mexican President made his ceremonial arrival twenty-four hours later, the Prime Minister might in the interim have an excellent opportunity to talk with Mr. Eisenhower. (If Mr. Eisenhower preferred to do this outside Washington, e.g. Gettysburg, it would please Mr. St-Laurent very much.) Then the inevitable joint ceremonies could proceed Monday and if necessary Tuesday, and the Prime Minister could depart, leaving the field clear for the Mexican President who would presumably stay another twenty-four hours.

6. The Prime Minister, if he had his choice, would prefer to leave to the Mexican President alone the privilege of addressing Congress. He realizes, however, that it may well be impossible to decline the suggestion of a "double bill" at a joint session of Senate and House. He leaves this in your hands.

7. Private talks between Mr. Dulles and myself would be useful, and I agree that we should try to make some preparations for these in advance.

PROPOSED VISIT TO WASHINGTON OF PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF MEXICO

This afternoon I conveyed to the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister's acceptance of the President's invitation.

2. On a personal basis I was able at the same time to convey, without discourtesy I trust, some impression of our lack of enthusiasm for a proposal which would appear to equate the relations between the United States and Canada and the United States and Mexico. In explanation I said that Canadians were naturally somewhat jealous of the especially intimate association existing between our two countries — this without intending any reflection whatever upon the Mexicans. Dulles said that he quite understood.

3. When I went on to suggest the possibility of separating the respective arrivals and departures, Dulles seemed to think that something might be done particularly regarding arrival; it might be desirable to make the departure simultaneous. However, he would wish to take this and other features of the proposed visit up with the President in the light of our reply. Incidentally, Dulles added that had the President or he thought that there would be any reluctance on the Canadian side to participate in a three-cornered visit they would not have approached the Mexicans. The intimations he had received in Ottawa last autumn gave no hint of this.

4. If the plan goes forward I think it now quite likely that the President will suggest somewhere south of Washington, for the meeting. This would certainly reduce problems of protocol and make the occasion a good deal more informal.

5. I will, of course, let you know at once as soon as I hear again from the Secretary of State.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS MEETING

On Tuesday morning we met formally in the President's sitting room for an hour and a quarter's discussion of the state of the world.

2. Mr. Dulles led off with a lengthy survey of impressions gained on his recent trip. He had not previously realized, he said, the extent to which the new countries of Asia, though they had gained their independence, were still deeply involved in building their constitutions. Of their intense interest in economic development, he said that this may well have come without the Soviet impact, but the latter had intensified it. The Soviet Union had itself made economic progress because it had coal and iron and a totalitarian system of labour which could force men to produce more than free labour. This combination of circumstances was not likely to be reproduced in other countries.

3. Although he stressed the importance of economic assistance, Mr. Dulles said he was not too much concerned over Soviet economic policy in Asia. What was much more dangerous and difficult to meet was their tactic of sowing hatred among peoples. He cited Soviet interference in the Middle East to exaggerate Arab hopes and Israeli fears and thereby create a dangerous situation. He blamed Bulganin and Khrushchev for rousing Indian fears of Pakistan. The situation in Kashmir was not as dangerous as that in Palestine, but it had the same element.

4. On the whole Mr. Dulles said he had found the assets of the free world in South Asia greater than he had expected. He spoke particularly of his satisfaction with the fact that a new Indonesian government had been formed without the Communists. He touched on the theme of the United States common experience with Indonesia as former colonies and admitted that by expressing these sentiments he had got "in Dutch with the Dutch". This illustrated, he said, the difficulties of showing understanding and sympathy with countries which had won or were seeking self determination while maintaining good relations in NATO. Nevertheless countries like Canada, Mexico, and the United States which had developed from colonial status, Canada by evolution and the other two by "more turbulent means", could share our experience and understanding with these new countries. The colonial powers for the most part did recognize the trend, he said, and paid special tribute to British policy in South Asia and Africa.

5. Mr. Dulles finished his report by speaking of the new vitality he had found in Japan. They seemed to have shaken off their former lethargy and were displaying a new interest in international affairs and a desire to play an active role in the world.

6. In conclusion Mr. Dulles said the three North American countries could play a very important role, particularly in relation to the newly developing area. Perhaps, he admitted, the smaller powers could have more effective influence than the larger because their motives were less suspect. One hundred and fifty years ago the United States, by reason of the moral influence of the American revolution, had exerted more influence in the world than had the Great Powers of that time.

7. Mr. St. Laurent said that he had gained much the same impression on his trip to Asia two years ago,[2] as had Mr. Dulles. He went on to ask for an opinion on the probability of serious conflict in the Middle East. In reply, Mr. Eisenhower said there were two certainties about the situation. The first was that the Israelis, rightly or wrongly, were convinced they were going to be attacked. The second was that Western Europe, perhaps Western civilization, had become more and more dependent on Middle Eastern oil. It was hard to reconcile these two factors.

8. Mr. Padillo Nervo then spoke of the necessity of mobilizing the moral and economic resources of the free world and of the need to make clear that we were not opposed to the aspirations of dependent and backward peoples.

9. Mr. Eisenhower said it was a great anomaly that at a time when people were worrying over the vestiges of colonialism, Russia held in abject slavery the peoples of the Baltic States and many other nationalities. Somehow or another we never seemed to be able to make this situation clear. He agreed entirely with what Mr. Padilla Nervo had said about the need for the free world to give moral and economic leadership.

10. President Ruiz Cortines then spoke through an interpreter a few lofty sentiments on the necessity of helping those with a desire for self determination and economic development.

11. President Eisenhower said that all this must be done against the background of an implacable Soviet policy. The Soviet leaders had repudiated Stalinism but they had not repudiated Marxism nor the dictatorship of the proletariat, the slave camp and the whip. There was a problem of timing involved. We must move in time to prevent countries being "chipped off" one by one by the Communists. The moral support of Canada and Mexico would help the United States. It would help him in the internal problems which the Administration had with their "isolationists and reactionaries". He stressed the importance of moral standards. He would like to see the North American continent a unit in its intellectual and moral approach to world problems.

12. Mr. Pearson said that he thought something pretty important was happening in Russia, something which might present us with opportunities which we should exploit. The changes that had taken place might possibly prove to be more than just a "zig". The alteration of tactics might mean a turn. The Russians had released forces which we could use for our own purposes. The problem was as much one of Russian power as of Communist policy. We must pay careful attention as to what is going on in the Soviet Union in order to make use of whatever opportunities it presented.

13. Mr. Pearson went on to speak of three problems in particular. The first one was the question of economic assistance. He was sure that the answer to the Soviet challenge was not to be found in trying to match Communist promises but rather to make more effective and even extend what we were doing for our own reasons.[3] What we did we must do in the right way without political strings attached. The manner in which we gave our assistance was highly important. He spoke of the approval with which President Eisenhower's proposals on disarmament to Marshal Bulganin had met in Canada. He wondered if a similar approach might be applied in the economic field. Might we not propose to exchange economic assistance blueprints with them through some agency say of the United Nations. We would put it up to them to cooperate in this work. It was not a question of arranging joint programmes with them but of an exchange of ideas and proposals. At the very least we would succeed in exposing their real intentions.

14. Perhaps, Mr. Pearson said, a similar joint approach might apply to the problems of the Middle East. A year ago it would have been unthinkable to suggest that the Soviet Union might be asked to discuss and to share in settling the problems of the Middle East. It would have been said that this would be letting them into that area. Now, however, they were already there for this reason and because the situation had deteriorated he thought it was quite right that the Great Powers should be bringing the question of Palestine before the United Nations for settlement. It might well be that in the United Nations the Great Powers, including perhaps the Soviet Union, might get together on a plan for settlement. Such a plan would probably not be acceptable to the two sides, but they might later be willing to have a settlement imposed upon them.[4] As for the nature of such a settlement he did not know of any better basis than that which Mr. Dulles had put forward last summer. (President Eisenhower intervened to say that Nasser was a problem. He was always changing his tune in what he said to people. He was "weak and fearful").

15. Mr. Pearson concluded by saying that the third problem was one which Mr. Dulles had not mentioned in his survey — that was Formosa. After a certain amount of hesitation Mr. Dulles spoke of their anxiety to get the Chinese to renounce the use of force and he referred to the Chinese revolution as having been achieved by force and violence and spoke of the use of force against Tibet and other areas. He thought that the Bandung Conference had had an effect on the policy of Peking and that this along with the strong position the US had taken had led to some improvement in the situation. The Communists were continuing their buildup on the mainland but not with the hysterical haste of fifteen months ago. At the Geneva meetings the US had succeeded in getting a few Americans out of China, but they had not been as successful as they had hoped. (He said that of the nineteen in jails, six only had been released).

16. At Geneva the Chinese had said that they would agree to renounce the use of force in international relations provided that the US would withdraw from Formosa and admit that the dispute over the island was a purely civil affair. The renunciation of the use of force, they made clear, applied only in international matters. However, the fact that the talks were still going on was grounds for some assurance and the US did not intend to break them off. They bore in mind the eventual success of the lengthy discussions at Panmunjom. From some quarters, largely from the Indians, had come the suggestion that a solution might be found by getting the nationalists to withdraw from Quemoy and Matsu. However, at Geneva the Communists had made no difference between these islands and Formosa proper. Nehru had not mentioned this suggestion when Mr. Dulles saw him, and it was not included in the memorandum Nehru had sent him through the Indian Ambassador. What was needed was a lull in the area. The US would not be on strong ground to press the nationalists to withdraw from the islands. China was one of a number of divided countries in Asia. Nothing would be gained by withdrawing anywhere in response to Communist pressure as the repercussions would be serious in Vietnam, Korea, the Philippines and other places in the area. He had been impressed by the fact that the Governor General of Ceylon was very worried lest there be any withdrawal before the Communists in Asia. At the President's request he told us that Prime Minister Hatoyama said to him that the first assumption of Japanese foreign policy was that the US would remain strong and not withdraw before Communist pressure. Hatoyama had asked him bluntly if the Japanese were justified in this assumption, and Dulles had assured him that they were.

[4] Voir/See Volume 22, Document 38.

17. The President then said that everyone in the free world wished that Quemoy and Matsu did not exist, but there they were. Chiang Kai-shek put the whole basis of the defence of Formosa in terms of morale and Quemoy and Matsu had been built up, perhaps erroneously, into a symbol. The defence of Formosa was absolutely vital. Mr. Dulles then likened Quemoy and Matsu to Berlin for the moral significance which that had acquired.

18. In conclusion there was a brief and somewhat pointless discussion of problems of Communist subversions in our countries.

RIVERS FLOWING ACROSS THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY — DISCUSSIONS AT WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS

During the Prime Minister's private talk with President Eisenhower yesterday afternoon, at which Secretary Dulles and I were present, Mr. St. Laurent referred to the proposal for diplomatic discussions between Canada and the US concerning rivers that flow across the international boundary.[5] Mr. St. Laurent said that what we were aiming at was an agreement on the principles which would govern the development of these rivers. The excellent work of the International Joint Commission was extremely valuable to both countries, but the questions which Canada proposed to discuss did not appear particularly susceptible of solution by the Commission. We hoped that there would be diplomatic discussions between the two governments which would fill in the gaps that had been found in the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty. The Prime Minister indicated that he hoped our proposal for diplomatic discussions would not present difficulties for the Administration in the forthcoming election campaign and he made it clear that the Canadian Government was not pressing for a speedy start to the discussions.

2. President Eisenhower's reaction was immediate and favourable and it seemed to me that he might have been prepared to have the discussions start without delay. The President indicated that he was not worried about the domestic political implications of our proposal, and it appeared that he would have been willing to announce immediately that the two countries had agreed to hold diplomatic discussions. At the close of the discussion the Prime Minister indicated to the President that we would follow up our proposal.

3. Prior to the Prime Minister's press conference, State Department officials indicated that they would have no objection to a statement to the press that the question of rivers crossing the international boundary had been discussed by the President and the Prime Minister. As it turned out, Secretary Dulles, at his press conference, which preceded ours by an hour, stated that the President and the Prime Minister had discussed questions relating to the development of the Columbia River Basin. When the Prime Minister spoke to the press, he said that he had discussed with President Eisenhower the possibility of having diplomatic discussions with the US concerning rivers which cross the international boundary.

4. Mr. Dulles clearly is in favour of our proposal, but I suspect he will be inclined to proceed at a slower pace than that which the President seemed prepared to set[6]

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE
AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS

Last evening you and I dined with Mr. Dulles at his residence. Livingston Merchant was the only other person present. During the two and a half hours which we had together the conversation ranged over a large number of topics, some of which had already been touched on at White Sulphur Springs. In five immediately succeeding telegrams I shall record summary notes on the more important topics discussed last evening. It will I think be more convenient to separate the topics in this way. If you have any corrections or additions from your own recollection I would be grateful to have them.

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS: TRANSCANADA PIPELINE; PROCEEDINGS BEFORE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Last night you took the opportunity when we were dining with the Secretary of State to express the hope that the proceedings before the Federal Power Commission on the application of Tennessee Gas would not be long delayed.

2. You made it quite clear that you were not attempting any interference with the proper exercise of the Federal Power Commission's jurisdiction, nor were you suggesting what the FPC's decision should be. You were simply drawing the Secretary's attention to the unfortunate repercussions in Canada if the proceeding before the Commission dragged on beyond this coming summer.

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS: N.A.T. MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING IN MAY[7]

You had an opportunity when we dined with the Secretary of State last evening of expressing again your hope that the ministers would have a chance of real discussion of political questions. In this connection you referred to Cyprus and North Africa. The Greeks would press for the former and it might be difficult and perhaps even unwise to avoid talking about these critical Mediterranean problems.

2. Dulles agreed that there should be full opportunity for serious political discussion in Paris and in advance of the meetings joint consideration should be given to the subjects to be dealt with and the manner in which they should be discussed. Incidentally you may remember that he thought Cyprus was within the NATO area.

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS: ARMS FOR THE MIDDLE EAST[8]

You referred at White Sulphur Springs to the danger of the Israeli Government concluding that the balance of arms was shifting rapidly against them unless they were able to obtain some of their requirements. It was for this reason that the Canadian Government had already authorized some shipments and were considering something more. Israeli authorities were particularly anxious to obtain from us F-86 fighters.

2. Dulles, who had told us he had been conferring with the President before dinner on the Middle East situation, said that the US Government felt that if they acceded in full to Israeli requests for arms, they would lose their ability to restrain the Arab States. On the other hand they were contemplating releasing in the near future some clearly defensive item (he mentioned antisubmarine mines as a possibility) and he did not see the same objection to other governments, for example Canada, authorizing the transfer of other weapons which Israel needed urgently. He thought that such action would go some distance to relieving Israeli apprehensions of the nature you had described. (Incidentally, Dulles said that perhaps Nasser would soon "have to be cut down to size").

3. It seemed evident to me that what Dulles meant was that the US Government would raise no objection if we decided, for example, to sell a squadron of F-86's to the Israelis and if other countries were disposed to take similar action. (Eban is coming to see me this afternoon. I understand on good authority that in his talk yesterday with Dulles he was told that the US Government would give "the green light" to other countries although they could not do much themselves). Presumably we would have to take great care before deciding upon a course which might be represented as pulling United States chestnuts out of the fire.

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS: INDOCHINA; US T.E.R.M. MISSION, FUTURE OF I.S.C.'S

Last evening when we dined with the Secretary of State, this topic was discussed briefly, particularly in relation to the proposed T.E.R.M. mission.[9]

2. Dulles reported that when he was in New Delhi, Mr. Nehru had seen no objection to the exercise which would have the effect of reducing the military potential in the South.

3. You assured Dulles that we had no desire to be more Indian than the Indians and that, provided the effect were as he stated it, we would not be difficult in the Commission.

4. In answer to our questions Dulles was unable to give us any reliable estimate concerning the nature and extent of the equipment in South Vietnam; nor did he know of what proportion it was intended to pull out of the country.

5. On the questions of the Diem Government's assumption of responsibility for the cease fire, Dulles was optimistic that something satisfactory would be worked out along the lines of the UK Ambassador's representations.

6. You took the opportunity of explaining the Canadian position concerning the continuation of the Commissions. We were willing to continue to carry the burden so long as the Commissions were making a contribution to the security of the area. It looked as if the Cambodian Commission could be wound up soon.

YOUR TALKS WITH THE SECRETARY OF STATE AFTER WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS: POSSIBLE SALE OF CF-100'S TO BELGIUM[10]

Last night you raised this problem with the Secretary of State, pointing out that, on grounds of security, the USAF were unwilling to release for transfer to Belgium the fire control system to equip CF-100's which the Belgian authorities wished to obtain from Canada. Whatever the merits of the position taken by the USAF, the resultant situation was exceedingly difficult and embarrassing in dealings with a North Atlantic ally alongside whom Canadian forces were serving with in Western Europe.

2. Neither Mr. Dulles nor Livingston Merchant had heard anything about this and the Secretary at once recognized the political difficulty involved in refusing the Belgian request. He promised to look into the position and let us know the result.

3. In describing the circumstances we said quite frankly that the RCAF were inclined to believe that the USAF position was quite justified on security grounds.

4. Merchant asked me to follow this matter up with him and, unless I am instructed to the contrary I will take an opportunity of doing so when I see him next week.

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN CANADA

We have received information from the United States Defence Department that they are seeking the President's authority to open negotiations with Canada for the use of atomic weapons over Canada. They further inform us that we may expect the first approach in about six or eight weeks. They point out that the U.S. law requires the custody of nuclear weapons to be retained by U.S. personnel. They would however train our personnel in their use, provide information necessary to design equipment such as aircraft to carry the weapons, and provide siting equipment and other ancillaries. The United States inform us that they intend to make similar proposals to other nations but will approach Canada first. They further request that we give this matter the closest possible security coverage.

As the U.S. approach is not expected for six or eight weeks, there does not appear to be any immediate action which should be taken, except to ensure that there is no leak of information from Canadian sources. You may recall that questions were asked in Parliament last year regarding the possession and storage of atomic bombs in Canada and at that [11] Pour en savoir plus sur les origines du « China exercise », voir volume 21, documents 752 à 756. Le durcissement de l'attitude des États-Unis à l'égard de la Chine communiste au cours de 1956 a mené le ministère des Affaires extérieures à conclure que l'échange proposé ne pourrait porter fruit. On peut trouver le document sur cette question dans le dossier MAE 50055-B-40. Voir également le volume 22, document 307.

On the origins of the "China exercise", see Volume 21, Documents 752-756. A hardening of the American attitude toward Communist China during 1956 apparently led the Department of External Affairs to conclude that the proposed exchange was unlikely to be fruitful. Material on this subject is located on DEA 50055-B-40. Also see Volume 22, Document 307.

time Mr. Campney pointed out that, for security reasons, no answers could be given on this matter.[12]

It is not quite clear from the information received what the U.S. requirements in Canada are going to be. The phrase "use of atomic weapons over Canada" seems to indicate that what they are seeking is authority to use air-to-air missiles in Canadian air space and perhaps, looking more into the future, authority to use Canadian air space for the delivery of intercontinental ballistic missiles.

As mention is made of the U.S. law requiring that the custody of nuclear weapons be retained by U.S. personnel, this may indicate that they have intentions of requesting the storage of these weapons on Canadian territory. As you may be aware, this question of storage was approached some years ago regarding the storage of weapons primarily for use by the United Kingdom, but this proposal was dropped when a security incident caused the abandonment of any UK-US collaboration in the supply of nuclear weapons. However arrangements were made at that time to allow the United States to construct a special building at Goose Bay for the purpose of holding atomic weapons.[13] It is my recollection that this installation was agreed to provide facilities for the storage of nuclear weapons or components on a temporary basis while aircraft were being serviced or if aircraft became grounded.

With regard to the suggestion that information regarding design of equipment, such as aircraft to carry weapons, etc., would be supplied, I understand this is being accomplished on a Service-to-Service channel and that this collaboration would be continued. You will recall that at the meeting of consultation on 5 December[14] I mentioned in discussing our requirements for air-to-air guided missiles (Sparrow) that we would be requiring at a later stage information and specifications on atomic warheads for this type of weapon.

I am sending this letter purely for your information and, as mentioned earlier, I do not think there is any action required now but I re-emphasize the need for the greatest possible security to avoid any leaks in Canada.

I will keep you informed of any further developments.

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN CANADA

It would appear from General Foulkes' letter that the United States authorities might have in mind two types of activity involving the use of atomic weapons in Canada:

(a) The deployment of bombs to SAC bases outside the United States so that their aircraft would have them readily available if it became necessary to launch an attack. At present, to the best of our knowledge, all atomic weapons are kept in the United States or in U.S. ships, but this would undoubtedly delay the Strategic Air Force in getting a major attack under way.

(b) The introduction of atomic weapons into the air defence system, both in ground-to-air and air-to-air roles.

2. If nothing more is involved than SAC deployments, the matter could be handled along the lines of the procedures agreed upon in 1951 for over-flights, i.e. by official government-to-government requests for permission to make such deployments.[15] If the use of atomic weapons in an air defence role is what the Americans have in mind, however, the problem is more difficult, and our position on the following questions would have to be considered:

(a) areas of Canada over which the weapons might be fired;

(b) operational control of weapons fired in the United States but functioning over Canada;

(c) availability of weapons for Canadian air defence forces;

(d) availability of full information on numbers, characteristics and effects of the weapons.

3. I think that the fact that this problem is coming up at this time is additional evidence of the importance of our getting on with the study of national security policy,[16] and in particular of our position with respect to North American air defence.

TOP SECRET. NO CIRCULATION. [Ottawa], January 18, 1956

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS OVER CANADA

General Foulkes stated in his letter of January 11 that the approach which the United States authorities are expected to make in late February or early March regarding the "use of atomic weapons over Canada" may be related to the use of air-to-air missiles in Canadian airspace and perhaps to the future delivery of intercontinental ballistic missiles through Canadian airspace.

2. These are not matters which come within the scope of existing agreements or understandings, except possibly the general agreement (embodied in the [35]th recommendation of the P.J.B.D.) for "reciprocal provision by mutual arrangement between the Governments of its military, naval and air facilities by each country to the armed forces of the other country", and the accompanying proviso that "military projects, tests or exercises, agreed to by both countries, whether jointly conducted or not, are without prejudice to the sovereignty of either country, confer no permanent rights or status upon either country, and give only such temporary rights or status as are agreed upon by the appropriate authorities of the two countries in authorizing the projects, tests or exercises".[17]

3. By implication, the "Agreed Minute" of June 14, 1951[18] indicated the willingness of the U.S. Government to obtain the prior consent of the Canadian Government for special operations in Canada of the U.S. Air Force, since it specified the channel to be used by the U.S. Government when requesting permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory —

(a) "for the deployment of atomic weapons (both without and with their nuclear components)",

(b) "for the conduct of operations involving the use of such weapons", or

(c) "to overfly Canadian territory with such weapons."

4. The Agreed Minute was not designed, however, to do more than afford a record of procedures which had been developed on an ad hoc basis for the mutual convenience of the two governments. It did not go further because it had become apparent that there were certain requirements held by each government to which the other could not agree. The U.S. Government was unwilling to enter into any agreement which would appear to qualify the right and responsibility of the President of the United States to make the decision that atomic weapons should be used. The Canadian Government for its part could not agree to surrender the right to decide whether or not Canadian facilities should be used for atomic strikes in any particular situation.

5. The agreed procedural arrangements governing clearance of flights of aircraft of the U.S. Strategic Air Command over Canadian territory where the movement of atomic weapons is involved were set out in detail in Schedule B (Top Secret) of Order-in-Council P.C. 2307 of April 17, 1952. These procedures do not appear to be directly relevant to the "use of atomic weapons over Canada".

6. The problem of storage of these weapons on Canadian territory was raised, as General Foulkes has pointed out, in relation to Goose Bay. On October 15, 1951, the United States authorities were informed that the Canadian Government had no objection to a proposal that a unit of the U.S. Air Force be permanently stationed there for "the operation and maintenance of a storage site at Goose Bay for the support of the Strategic Air Command operations from that base." It was clearly understood at the time that these storage facilities were for special weapons.

7. It will be noted that the agreements relating to special storage facilities and to clearance of special flights are both connected with strategic air operations. The proposals now anticipated are apparently connected rather with the operations of the air defence system. It seems that the U.S. authorities are prepared to make plans and preparations for the use of atomic weapons in a defensive role "over Canada" and by Canadian forces — while restricting custody of the weapons to U.S. forces, as required by U.S. law.

8. This may well be a major step towards the creation of an integrated weapons system for North American defence, which we had already become convinced was essential and urgent. An integrated weapons system, however, would hardly be practicable without a greater measure of integrated planning than exists at present. The proposal seems certain, therefore, to raise politically important problems of control and cost-sharing which have not so far had to be faced in so direct a form.

TOP SECRET

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF THE CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCES OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES DURING PEACETIME

The Joint Staff have given us a copy of a telegram they sent to Ottawa dated February 16. We are sending you the text for your convenience. In connection with this you may wish to refer to paragraph 35(h) of record of the meeting of consultation attached to our despatch under reference. The following is the CJS signal mentioned: Text begins:

1. Following is the text of a memorandum received from Secretary U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff "Paragraph one. In their continuing study of military measures essential to the strengthening of the air defences of the North American continent, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the desirability of peacetime integration of operation control of the continental elements of the Air Defence Systems of Canada and the United States, including the continental portions of the warning systems. As a result of their examination of this subject, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have approved in principle the need for such integration of operational control.

2. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that it would be desirable to reach agreement in such areas as the composition of subordinate forces, the assignment of tasks, the designation of objectives, and the authoritative direction necessary to accomplish the mission of providing air defence for Canada and the continental United States. Operational control in this respect would not include such matters as administration, discipline, internal organization, unit training and logistics.

3. In order that the necessary details of such an arrangement may be developed at an early date, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have directed the undertaking of immediate studies in this field. In taking this action, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff are fully aware that any studies made unilaterally on the subject in the United States will be without substance if not responsive to Canadian views.

4. With this in mind, the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff request the views of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee on the desirability of integrating in peacetime the operational control of the continental elements of our two air defence systems. Suggestions on the best procedure by which combined study and planning in that direction might be undertaken also are solicited. Text ends.

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN CANADA

1. With reference to my letter of 11 January, I have now received further information from the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington, as follows:

"Colonel Crowson, Military Assistant to Assistant to Secretary of Defence (Atomic Energy) informed me that first approach by United States on proposals for use of atomic weapons over Canada may be expected before the end of March on channel State Department-Canadian Ambassador Washington. U.S. would probably propose that discussions take place in PJBD.

"Crowson said that present U.S. law requires custody of nuclear weapons to be retained by U.S. nationals, thus U.S. will probably ask to have American units stationed in Canada. He said that they anticipate that this will be unacceptable to Canada and that we may insist on Canadian personnel having custody of weapons and using them in Canadian units. He said that in anticipation of this the Joint Chiefs of Staff are examining the requirements for amendments to present U.S. legislation. If the initial U.S. request to have American units stationed in Canada is refused, they may offer a compromise providing for the stationing of U.S. units in Canada for a fixed period which would allow them time to amend their laws. These units would train Canadian personnel in the use of nuclear weapons."

I am requesting the Chairman of the Joint Staff Washington to brief Mr. Heeney on these matters so that he will be fully informed before he is approached by the State Department.

2. It would appear that it would be useful to give some consideration to the best approach to be made by Canada on this problem before the exchange of notes actually takes place. I would therefore suggest that it might be useful if a preliminary discussion on this matter could be held by the same group as considered this question previously. I would be grateful for your views.

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET Washington, March 19, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson],

I sent on Friday a short telegram addressed to yourself and the Under-Secretary (No. 498†). I am sure you will have seen that my purpose was to make sure that Foulkes had told you of the approach made from the Department of Defense to the Canadian Joint Staff on the "use of atomic weapons over Canada in an air defence role". I did not think it useful to attempt to go into the story in detail, or discuss the substance, in a telegram.

I received from Major Williams (in Sparling's absence) a letter of which I attach a copy. It is not clear to me why I was not informed of this matter in January, and the letter seems to imply further that you and Jules [Léger] may not have been told until very recently. This absence of consultation will have to be looked into at some time.

As far as I can see from Williams' letter, the Department of Defense took the proper action in giving to the Joint Staff advance warning of an important approach which would itself obviously have to be made on the government channel. From our point of view in Washington, and perhaps from yours, the way in which the subject has been handled has made futile the obvious efforts of the Americans to enable the Canadian Government to examine the approach before it is made (or perhaps to suggest that it would be wiser not to make it).

You will see from Williams' letter that the Americans are likely to ask first that American units armed with nuclear weapons should be stationed in Canada. They are wise enough to see that this will probably be unacceptable, and are examining a compromise which can be offered only in the event that the Atomic Energy Act is revised.

I doubt if you would feel that the Americans were wrong in their impression that we could not accept the first suggested request. There must be considerable doubt as to whether we could accept the second, although it might be possible to work out some arrangement in due course which would provide that nuclear weapons could be used in the defence of the continent on either side of the boundary.

I would imagine that in whatever form the United States proposal is made it could be answered only after an elaborate study has been made of the future problems of continental defence and the principles on which Canadian-American co-operation are to be built. You will recall that on Feb. 20 we repeated to you (our telegram No. 289 of Feb. 20) the Joint Staff telegram to Ottawa on integration of operational control. I mentioned this subject when I was in Ottawa and found that the Department (Macdonnell) was aware of the consultations taking place on the military level. It had also been decided, I gather, that it would be best not to have political officers associated directly with this process. Any question of the presence in Canada of American forces equipped with atomic weapons would also have to be considered in relation to the "Agreed Minute" of June 14, 1951, which, you will recall, is the basis of the meetings of consultation and of the procedure by which requests to deploy atomic weapons or over-fly Canada with atomic weapons were to be made.

Williams has just told us that he has heard from the Department of Defense that this project has been referred to the White House. Presumably it will be some time before we are approached but, as I pointed out in my telegram, if called in I could do no more than report what was said. I am anxious to have a talk with you about this subject when you are in Washington. The purpose of this letter is to give you whatever information I have and to indicate my concern both with the intended proposal itself and the apparent lack of co-ordination here and in Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET Washington, March 15, 1956

Dear Mr. Heeney:

On 10 January 1956, Colonel D.L. Crowson, Military Assistant to the Honourable Herbert Loper, Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Atomic Energy) informed me that the U.S. Department of Defense was seeking the President's authority to open negotiations with us for the use of atomic weapons over Canada in an air defence role. He said at that time that we might expect the first approach in six to eight weeks.

Colonel Crowson explained that U.S. law requires that the custody of nuclear weapons be retained by U.S. personnel. They would propose to train our personnel in the use of nuclear weapons, provide us with information necessary to design our equipment for their use and would provide certain sighting and other ancillary equipment. He said that they are asking for authority to make similar proposals to other nations in due course but the approach to Canada will come first. Crowson asked that this information should not be circulated, so only General Sparling and General Foulkes were informed.

In another conversation on 12 March, Crowson told me that the initial approach by the United States could be expected before the end of March from the State Department to you. He said that the United States would probably propose that the detailed discussion should take place in the PJBD.

Referring again to the restrictions imposed by the U.S. Atomic Energy Act, Crowson said that the initial request by the United States would likely be simply for the stationing of American units, armed with nuclear weapons in Canada. He said that they anticipate that this will be unacceptable to Canada and that we may insist upon having full knowledge of the details of the weapons which they propose to use in our country and upon Canadian units having equivalent armament. He said that in anticipation of this, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are examining the requirements for amendments to present U.S. legislation. If the initial U.S. request to have American units stationed in Canada is refused, they may offer a compromise providing for the stationing of U.S. units in Canada for a fixed period which would allow them time to amend their laws. These units would train Canadian personnel in the use of nuclear weapons.

In the absence of General Sparling I reported this second conversation to General Foulkes and he asked me to brief you, saying that he would inform Mr. Léger and Mr. Bryce. He asked me also to ask Crowson in what part of Canada the Americans would ask to have units stationed. If Labrador and Newfoundland are the only locations, there might not be much difficulty in getting government approval. I have arranged to see Crowson tomorrow morning.

Yours sincerely,

E.J. WILLIAMS

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS OVER CANADA

1. With reference to my letter of 14 March, after giving this matter further consideration I felt it would be easier for us to deal with this subject if we had more information as to where the United States planned to store atomic weapons in Canada. If this storage was limited to areas where they would be of use to the US squadrons already stationed in Canada, this would not give as much concern as if they required storage at places like Edmonton, St. Hubert, etc. I therefore requested the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington to have some informal conversations with the Defense Department on the question of more specific locations required for storage. I have just received the following reply:

"Crowson said this morning that it is the Department of Defense view that it is desirable that the forces of Canada and the U.S. which are employed in the air defence of this continent should be armed to the same standards. Department of Defense has requested the President's authority to discuss the problem with Canada. He had delivered their request to the White House on 15 March.

"Crowson said that without an amendment to the U.S. Atomic Energy Act of 1954 the only way that the Americans can achieve coverage with nuclear air defence weapons of vital approaches to the U.S. is by stationing their units in Canada. In order to achieve an amendment to the Act, Department of Defense wishes to present conclusive reasons to Congress. They are suggesting as a line of approach that Canada should be asked to accept stationing of U.S. units in Canada in order that our anticipated refusal would support their case. They would not refer to precise locations but rather would ask for approval in principle. Their interest is not confined to the Newfoundland-Labrador area.

"Crowson emphasized that this was a line of approach which Department of Defense had suggested and might not necessarily be followed. They feel that the discussions in PJBD will consume six to eight months, and that no time is to be lost if they are to get an amendment to the Atomic Energy Act through this session of Congress. They have therefore asked the White House to treat it as a matter of urgency. Crowson said that the first approach is still likely to come on the State Department-Ambassador channel but there is the possibility that the President will discuss the question with Mr. St. Laurent during his forthcoming visit. He said that he would inform us as soon as he learned anything more on the channel and timing of the approach.

"Crowson said it would be helpful if we could provide him with any other information on timings such as when the Cabinet would resume sitting after 23 April."

2. You will note that it is suggested that the President might raise this question with the Prime Minister during his forthcoming visit. In view of this suggestion, it would perhaps be useful if we could get together some time before the end of this week to draft a memorandum for the Prime Minister.[20]

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS IN CANADA

Following for the Ambassador only: Begins:

General Foulkes had in fact informed Bryce and Léger that the U.S. Defense Department was seeking the President's authority to open negotiations with Canada for the use of atomic weapons over this country.

2. I understand that the Chairman of the Joint Staff is briefing you fully and that you will therefore have as much information as is available to us here. You will be aware therefore that we have very little information concerning the exact nature of the U.S. proposal and that until we have more information it will be difficult to consider its possible implications in any detail. From what we do know, however, it is clear that the implications will be important and will call for most careful study by the Canadian Government.

3. It is essential that the initial State Department approach should be informal and exploratory in character, so that there will be ample opportunity for a full exchange of views and information before any diplomatic exchange is considered. I think it would be desirable for you to ensure that the State Department appreciates this so as to avoid the possibility that the first approach might be a formal one.

4. General Foulkes has informed me, and you probably already know, of the possibility that the President will discuss this question with Mr. St. Laurent during the latter's forthcoming visit, although it is still likely that the first approach will be made to you by the State Department. If you hear any more about the channel and timing of the approach or about its probable contents, please let me know.

5. We are giving urgent consideration to this whole question here and I shall of course inform you of any developments. Ends.

USE OF ATOMIC ANTI-AIRCRAFT WEAPONS OVER CANADA

1. We have heard through military channels that the U.S. State Department is likely to approach our Ambassador in Washington in the near future concerning the possible use by the U.S. Air Force over Canada of atomic warheads in air-to-air anti-aircraft weapons, which they are planning to use over the United States. This matter has been taken up with President Eisenhower and it is possible that he may speak to you about it in White Sulphur Springs.[21] We are setting forth below some of the facts and arguments on it, but our suggestion is that your reply to the President should be quite non-committal other than a promise to look into the question, with perhaps an indication that it raises a number of complex problems.

2. Our military authorities have been aware for some time that the United States was planning to use atomic warheads in certain of its rockets or guided missiles to be used against bombers attacking North America. We have only a little information about these weapons and I think much of it came out in the Cabinet Defence Committee discussions concerning air defence late last fall.[22] You will recall that General Partridge of the United States said something in New York some weeks ago about the use of these weapons, and there was a question in Parliament by Mr. Knowles about the matter, which Mr. Campney answered relatively briefly after some discussion in Cabinet.

3. Under the existing bilateral agreement on cooperation between Canada and the United States regarding atomic information for mutual defence purposes,[23] we would be able to receive a considerable amount of information on the characteristics of nuclear weapons and their effects. But it would require amendments to the U.S. Atomic Energy Act before the United States could furnish the Canadian Forces with any nuclear weapons, even of the defensive varieties now being developed in the United States. We believe that the American Services would be disposed to furnish such defensive atomic weapons to the Canadian Services for use in the joint defence of North America, and indeed we have some reason to suspect that the Americans think our response to the approach to be made is likely to be such as will give them an excuse to go to Congress for legislative changes to enable them to furnish us not only with information but with the weapons themselves.

4. Our own air defence plans, of course, are still in the process of revision and it is not yet possible to speak with any precision on what they are likely to be, although we have some general ideas of the lines on which they are going to develop. Consequently, in any discussion with the Americans, we would have to preserve considerable freedom of action and make clear that governmental decisions have not yet been made on a number of the matters which will be relevant to a consideration of this request that they are about to make.

5. American air defence squadrons should only be based in Canada if, and to the extent that, Canada cannot herself supply enough squadrons to meet the threat that must be met from Canadian bases. As yet, there is no indication that this reason will require American squadrons based in Canada, other than those already in Newfoundland and Goose Bay. The Air Force and Chiefs of Staff are now working on plans to increase the number of regular R.C.A.F. squadrons. We understand that Mr. Campney has approved this proposal in principle but does not wish to bring it forward for consideration by his colleagues until he can also bring forward plans for the tapering down of air training activities and for the reorganization of the Auxiliary Squadrons of the Air Force Reserve. These latter questions may involve a delay of some weeks before he is ready to propose a revised Air Force programme for consideration by the Cabinet Defence Committee. However, it would appear feasible, even at this stage, to indicate to the United States that we do have in mind the expansion of our own air defence squadrons and the creation of new operating bases for this purpose, particularly in the area north of the Great Lakes and the Prairies. In addition, we are working on the re-location northward of our existing squadrons, so as to extend the battle area as far as possible north of the settled areas of Canada.

6. The expansion of the Canadian air defence effort in Canada, and the possibility of having to rely upon some U.S. squadrons occupying bases in Canada presents a real problem in connection with the twelve Canadian squadrons based in Europe, even though the U.S. Forces will likely, for the most part, not be fighter squadrons, but rather concerned with the operation of radar stations, and later possibly with guided missile installations. We understand that the Ministers concerned would be most reluctant to withdraw Canadian squadrons from Europe if that can be avoided. The reasons for this are partly those of broad policy in the Alliance and partly military. Our air division is one of the most efficient air units in Europe and there is no early prospect of European units of equal quality taking over its role. Moreover, the Supreme Allied Commander attaches a great deal of importance to having a Canadian unit of this kind in Europe, as does the N.A.T.O. Council itself. On the other hand, it would be difficult for Canada to maintain a substantial number of Canadian air squadrons in Europe if U.S. squadrons were to be based in Canada. It is true that the U.S. squadrons would in fact be defending the United States, perhaps to a larger extent than they would be defending Canada if the locations were properly chosen with this in view. Nevertheless most Canadians would believe that they were at least in part here to defend Canada. Many would argue that Canada should defend herself first and not have to rely upon the United States while Canada is engaged largely in the defence of Europe. This is an argument that the Americans will surely understand and appreciate.

7. Canadians will need considerable reassurance that atomic anti-aircraft weapons can be safely used over their heads and homes. They would look to their own government and Armed Services to give them that reassurance, even though the U.S. Forces were using them over the United States itself. Consequently it would be necessary for Canadians to be throughly familiar with the weapons and their use if such weapons are to be used over Canada. It would also appear necessary that the parties responsible for the storage and safe carriage of such weapons in Canada should be answerable to the Canadian government.

8. If the U.S. and Canadian military authorities are convinced that these weapons will be the most efficient in air defence, it is in the interest of both the United States and Canada that Canadian squadrons should be equipped with them as well as American squadrons. If this should not take place, it will be apparent that some lack of confidence between the two nations is impeding the most effective defence of each of them. Such an implication would be highly undesirable in the sort of partnership that it appears continental defence is now going to require.

9. Canadian Service planning of aircraft weapons and other related aspects of the Air Force programme have been based on the assumption that at some time atomic anti-aircraft weapons will be standard in the air defence of North America. Canadians now do not have all the knowledge necessary to determine whether and when the use of such weapons will be warranted. It is expected, however, that at some point the U.S. defence authorities will wish to discuss this matter with our defence authorities. Some such discussion may take place now within the terms of our bilateral agreement on military atomic energy matters, but additional specific authority may be required if it is to be fruitful.

10. In discussions with the United States it seems desirable to have these points in mind even though they need not be expressed at the present time.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET Washington, April 6, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson],

When you were in Washington we had a brief conversation about the manner of planning future arrangements for continental defence. You suggested that I might set out to you in a personal letter certain worries which George Glazebrook and I share on this subject.

2. There are two important projects now under discussion between Canadian and United States military authorities. The first of these is the proposal for the integration of "operational control" of the air defences of Canada and the United States. In my telegram No. 289 of February 20 I sent to you the text of a memorandum of February 14 received by our Joint Staff here from the Secretary of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. This was answered by a letter from Sparling and I think that I should give you the text, at least for your own reading. The most recent document† (copy of which is also enclosed) is the memorandum from the Joint Chiefs to Sparling suggesting that an ad hoc group be formed in early May. You will see that the American suggestion is that this ad hoc group include representatives of the Chiefs of Staff.

3. As perhaps a minor point, I am not very happy about the heavy-handed military expressions on "political sensitivities". On the proposal itself, the distinction between a single command and integrated operational control, it seems to me, is likely to prove pretty narrow in practice. No doubt the latter may sound better, and no doubt there have been subtracted from command some functions which we prefer to be national. On the other hand, surely it is the operational control which is significant?

4. The second main development in this field relates to atomic weapons in Canada and has been covered on paper by my personal letter to you of March 19† and by telegrams

DL-529 of March 21 and DL-547 of March 23.[24] Here it would seem to me that Bryce's memorandum is a valuable and helpful document. But it was, of course, intended primarily for the immediate use of the Prime Minister and leaves further study to be made. When I was seeing Livingston Merchant on March 23, I mentioned the undesirability of any formal approach to us before there had been informal (political) conversations. While he had known little about the plan, he agreed with me.

5. I do not wish to express any opinion as to whether either a combined command or integrated operational control is in itself necessary or wise at the present time; nor am I competent to judge under what technical conditions and to what extent atomic weapons deployed in Canada are needed for the defence of North America. It may well be that either or both of these radical innovations should be agreed. What I am concerned about is the procedure.

6. Over a period of years now, and I am sure rightly, there have existed special bodies, of which the PJBD is the principal one, to deal with questions relating to continental defence as they arise. Part of this machinery, and again no doubt a proper part, provides for military consultations between Canadian and United States officers.

7. I would venture to suggest that, from some points of view, the technical consultations are in danger of getting ahead of governmental decisions. As an ex-historian, you will recall the old controversy as to the extent to which "staff talks" constitute a commitment on the governments permitting them to be held. Perhaps the most famous case in modern times is that of the Anglo-French staff talks in the few years before 1914. If the United States and Canadian Chiefs of Staff should agree on an integrated operational control of our air defences and the deployment of U.S. atomic units in Canada, I wonder whether the Government would be as free as it should to take decisions on the merits?

8. In any event, it does seem to me that it would be appropriate to have fully-developed Canadian military views on these two subjects submitted to Canadian Ministers and at least a provisional expression of governmental opinion before bilateral military talks are launched. It may be that these steps have indeed been taken and that the Government is in a position to authorize the military conversations to be started. My impression, however, is to the contrary.

9. There may be a tendency on the part of some of our military officers to think, for instance in the case of the atomic weapons suggestion, that this is a means of securing for Canada knowledge, and perhaps weapons, which could not otherwise be obtained. If so, this is an understandable motive but is a wrong approach. The defence of the North American area as a whole is becoming more and more of a single problem with the increase in air speed and development of new weapons. Canadians should not feel that they are suppliants before the U.S. military authorities. The interest in putting atomic weapons in Canada is at least as much for the defence of the United States as it is for the defence of Canada. The siting is simply a technical question of where such installations can be most effectively placed. We have no reason to make any bargains.

10. The time has come when there should be a re-examination of the whole problem of the defence of North America — not only the technical aspects but also the principles which should govern the relations between the two Governments and their military forces in this joint undertaking. So far as I know no such general exercise is underway in Ottawa — in any event none which includes political as well as military "experts". I am therefore somewhat concerned when such important items as the two I have mentioned appear to be taken up piecemeal, rather than as a part of, and to some extent a sequel to, general decisions on the pattern likely to obtain during, say, the next ten years.

11. It is inevitable and logical that there should be a close relationship between Canada and the United States for the defence of what, for that purpose, is rapidly becoming a single area. To this no reasonable Canadian takes exception. Yet the very military factors which compel this conclusion raise questions which are much more than military. It does seem to me, therefore, that the procedure by which we seek to solve the problem, in all its complexities and difficulties, must be such as to avoid the Government being led step by step into a fixed position without having had a proper opportunity to assess it as a whole.

12. Finally, I should say that in expressing these views I am not unaware of the argument that in going ahead "on the military net" without close political liaison, situations of embarrassment to the political authorities can be avoided. This is always something to be balanced against the danger of unconscious commitment. In the present situation, however, there is little doubt in my mind that the political dangers of ignorance far outweigh any conceivable advantage.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET

I have been directed by the Chairman of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff to reply to your memorandum SM-126-56 dated 14 February 1956.

2. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff agree that it would be desirable to study methods of integrating in peacetime operational control of continental elements of the air defence of North America. They suggest that this study be undertaken by an ad hoc group of US and Canadian Air Force Officers reporting separately to the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff through the Chiefs of Air Staff. The composition of the group would be mutually determined by the Chiefs of Air Staff.

3. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff further suggest that to avoid raising delicate political problems the ad hoc group should limit their discussions and recommendations to the problems of operational control. They point out that this subject of operational control is very sensitive politically in Canada and that it is important that there should be no leakage of information regarding the proposed group or the subject of its discussions to the press.

Dear Mike [Pearson],

I hope that I am not burdening you with too many letters on continental defence, but at least this one has a rather more cheerful message than I could find in my letters of April 6 and 10.†

2. Outerbridge Horsey has just told George Glazebrook of the results of the State Department's enquiries about the conversations which have taken place between officers in the Department of Defence and the Joint Staff on the possible placing of atomic weapons in Canada.

3. It has now been learned that the disclosure to the CJS of a possible approach on this subject was not authorized by any high authority in the Pentagon. Horsey said that they raised no objection to the disclosure of the fact of a possible approach, but he was obviously concerned with the tactics that had been suggested. No one knows how the idea originated that the Canadian Government should be approached with a proposal which it would turn down and so enable the Administration to get the Atomic Energy Act amended. But Horsey was anxious for us to know that there was no authority for such an idea and no plan that such a proposal would be made.

4. He added that the State Department will bear in mind the desirability of having informal conversations on whatever plan may in the future be proposed in order to allow for the use of atomic weapons in continental defence. Only a handful of officers in the State Department are aware of this subject at all and we have been given a list of who they are.

5. I am relieved to know that this fantastic idea of using the Canadian Government as a battering ram in Congress has been thoroughly disowned and, further, that whatever suggestions may in future be put forward will be first explored between the State Department and ourselves in a quite informal way.

6. I shall let Sparling know of what we were told this morning.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], April 11, 1956

CANADA-UNITED STATES DEFENCE ACTIVITIES

There have been some new developments regarding Canada - United States defence projects about which I believe you will wish to be informed.

2. The first item relates to the extension of the air defence combat zone northward to the mid-Canada warning line. You will recall that this was discussed in general terms in the course of the review of the CF-105 programme last autumn. The RCAF is about to come forward with a request for authorization of joint RCAF - USAF surveys for 26 heavy radar stations, one hundred unmanned gap-filler radar stations, two BOMARC installations (one near Sudbury and the other near Ottawa) which would be manned by the RCAF, and a SAGE (semi-automatic ground environment) sector in connection with the BOMARC installations. The site surveys would of course be without prejudice to subsequent authorization of construction or to the inter-governmental arrangements covering these projects. The Canada-United States Military Study Group and its Scientific Advisory Team have launched a study of "the existing and programmed air defence combat system northward to the Mid-Canada line". It is expected that the proposal will subsequently be discussed at the PJBD, perhaps at the July meeting.

3. The extension of the combat zone northward to the Mid-Canada line is, of course, related to the problem of the integration of operational control of the continental air defences and to the introduction of atomic weapons into the air defence system. The integration study agreed upon by the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries has not yet got under way, and so far there have been no further advances by the United States authorities concerning the introduction of atomic weapons into Canada.

4. The second item is the long-expected appearance of a U.S. request to carry out site surveys for the possible construction of up to eleven Strategic Air Command tanker squadron bases in Northern Canada.[25] The prospective sites are as follows:

1. Coral Harbour (Southampton Island)
2. Saglek or Resolution Island (North end of Labrador coast)
3. Knob Lake
4. Namao (Edmonton)
5. Cold Lake (RCAF missile establishment)
6. The Pas
7. Fort Churchill
8. Frobisher
9. Chimo
10. Winisk (on Mid-Canada line, West side of James Bay)
11. Great Whale River (on Mid-Canada line, East side of James Bay)

[25] Voir les documents 106 et 107.
See Documents 106 and 107.

5. The nature of the requirement and the details of the United States plan have been developed in an exchange of letters between Major General Briggs and Air Vice Marshal Dunlap, the U.S. and Canadian Air Force Members of the PJBD (copies attached†). This project is also expected to be considered at the May meeting of the PJBD. The RCAF has already indicated informally to the USAF that irrespective of the decision on the other prospective sites, Namao and Cold Lake are not likely to be available.

6. Finally, we have been informed quite unofficially "from a usually reliable source" that a proposal will be put forward in the next two or three months for the construction of five very large radars for tracking intercontinental ballistic missiles.[26] Two of these radars would probably be on the DEW line and three on the Mid-Canada line. An indication of the size of these stations can be gained from the report that the "sail" of the rotating antenna is 200 feet wide. The establishment of these radars would, of course, be the first step in the possible development of a system of defence against inter-continental missiles.

7. I have attached for convenient reference a copy of the DL(1) memorandum of March 12, 1956,† summarizing the principal United States defence activities in Canada.

II. ADDITIONAL REGULAR FORCE AIR DEFENCE SQUADRONS AND BASES; REDUCTION OF NATO AIRCREW TRAINING

Problems are looming! L.B. P[earson]

4. The Minister of National Defence recalled that when the Committee had considered the implications of proceeding with the CF105 aircraft programme in the fall,[27] it had been informed of other requirements of the North American air defence system. These plans, which had been developed by the Air Defence Commands of both Canada and the United States, indicated that 18 all-weather air defence squadrons located on 18 air defence bases in Canada were required. The Chiefs of Staff felt that only 15 bases were needed, of which two or three might become long-range (BOMARC) missile stations. It had originally been anticipated that the 10 Auxiliary fighter squadrons would have been re-equipped with CF-100's but it was now agreed that the conditions required for efficient operations in modern air defence were too exacting to impose on reserve forces and that flying the CF100 was too heavy a demand to place on part-time aircrews. The gap thus created would have to be filled by increasing the number of regular force all-weather air defence squadrons. The first step in this expansion of the regulars would involve an increase of three all-weather squadrons, three new bases and the completion of six partially developed bases. This would require $56.4 million for base construction, spread over four years, $53.3 million for aircraft for three new squadrons, and an annual recurring cost of $36.1 million and added manpower. The manpower requirement could be met almost entirely by a proposed reduction of NATO aircrew training to be subsequently discussed. The increased costs for the regular force would be partially balanced by the reductions in NATO training and in the expenditure which would have been necessary to re-equip the 10 Auxiliary squadrons with CF100's and ground facilities.

The Minister, on the recommendation of the Chiefs of Staff, proposed that approval in principle be given for an increase from the existing five bases and nine regular force fighter squadrons to a total of 15 regular force squadrons deployed on 15 bases; specifically, authority was sought for formation of three additional CF100 squadrons by May, 1958; the improvement of six existing bases to bring them up to operational standards as main or satellite fighter bases; the development of three new satellite bases; and site surveys and planning for the bases on which squadrons would be redeployed in the second phase of the programme.

5. Mr. Campney pointed out that one new feature of the programme was the concept of a main base on which there would be the principal maintenance facilities, married quarters, repair depots, etc., and two satellite fields connected with each main base which would be purely operational and where there would be the minimum of amenities. This would create morale and personnel problems for the Air Force but they were prepared to accept these problems in order to effect a saving in expenditures.

As regards the question of NATO aircrew training, the original agreement would end with the intake year of 1957-58. However, the plan, which had as its aim the initial manning of the front-line aircraft of the countries concerned, would appear to have reached its goal by 1957. Canada would, by that time, have trained sufficient pilots to man 80% of the operational forces assigned to SACEUR. The NATO Council had agreed that maintenance of force goals was a national responsibility and it would appear that aircrew training to meet attrition fell into this category. SACEUR felt that, with the exception of a small requirement for Norway, Denmark and Holland, the other countries which had benefited from the Canadian programme were capable of replacing their aircrew attrition. The Chiefs of Staff considered it would be inadvisable to renew the existing Canadian-NATO aircrew training scheme on the completion of the 1957-58 period and thought instead that possibilities should be investigated of making other arrangements with Norway, Denmark and perhaps Holland for a limited number of students who could be fitted into the R.C.A.F. training system without the requirement for special facilities. They also felt that consideration might be given to the preparation of further mutual aid programmes to assist NATO countries to increase their air training self-sufficiency. Such programmes might include Harvard and T33 jet trainers which would become surplus as a result of curtailment of training in Canada. The proposal would result in a manpower saving of about 495 officers, 1870 airmen and 580 civilians, and an annual financial saving of about $31 million. These savings were urgently required to apply against the costs of the air defence build-up in Canada. He recommended that the Canadian NATO air training scheme be terminated upon completion of the 1957-58 period and that investigations be made with a view to training a limited number of Norwegian, Danish and Dutch personnel in Canada without involving additional facilities.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had no desire to question the necessity for new squadrons in Canada but to meet the added costs by the abandonment of mutual aid aircrew training might be difficult and embarrassing. There were political considerations in the proposal which should be taken into account and he hoped that the proposal to reduce mutual aid in this manner to find some of the money for increased facilities at home would not be approved until he had further time to study the matter. This was another stage in the dilemma of balancing continental and European commitments. If we could not undertake both, it might well be that we would have to withdraw from Europe, but this should be done gradually and with the minimum political disadvantages. He would not like to see a decision to reduce NATO aircrew training taken until its implications for NATO had been fully considered. For example, the Cyprus question would probably be discussed at the next NATO Council meeting in a few days' time and at this very moment Greece had requested, through our Ambassador in Athens, a number of vacancies in the air training programme. He was not arguing against the proposition as such, but before a decision was taken he wanted to "prepare the way" with the other countries involved.

7. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The programme had been a successful one but the job had in fact been done. Certain countries who had training facilities had reduced them while continuing to send personnel to Canada just because ours were available. Furthermore, not all the vacancies were being filled and the cost of the plan was exceedingly high. Except in the case of Norway and Denmark and, to a lesser extent, Holland, the continuation of training of aircrew for other NATO countries did not now seem necessary.

(b) The future of the 10 Auxiliary fighter squadrons had still to be settled but it was thought at the moment that the six squadrons in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal would be re-equipped with F86's which would become available when the four regular squadrons of the Air Division were re-equipped with CF100's, and that the other four squadrons would be assigned non-flying roles. The Auxiliaries, particularly those in the larger cities, provided an excellent nucleus for expansion in the event of an emergency.

(c) If mutual aid were to be continued the programme would be much more useful if the money were spent on aircraft and equipment to be transferred abroad rather than on continuation of the aircrew training programme.

8. The Committee deferred decision on the proposals to provide additional Regular Air Force defence squadrons and bases and to reduce the NATO aircrew training programme pending further examination interdepartmentally of their implications and the conclusion of the NATO Ministerial Council meetings being held in Paris next month.[28]

SECRET [Ottawa], May 7, 1956

TEXAS TOWER ON BROWN'S BANK

You may recall that in my memorandum of November 22, 1955,[29] I drew to your attention a problem which we are encountering concerning the United States proposal to erect a Texas Tower on Brown's Bank about 75 miles south of Cape Sable, Nova Scotia.

2. After consultation with the Inter-departmental Committee on Territorial Waters and with the United States Section of the PJBD, it was agreed that the appropriate way to deal with this problem would be to have a suitable entry in the PJBD Journal.

3. The entry proposed by Canadian officials and submitted to you for approval, read as follows:

"The Board agreed that the establishment of a 'Texas Tower' on Brown's Bank off the coast of Nova Scotia was needed as an off-shore extension of the North American Early Warning System for Air Defence and noted with approval the intention of the U.S. Air Force to construct such a tower. The Board urged that precautions be taken during the construction period to avoid undue damage to the fisheries on Brown's Bank and suggested that at the appropriate time the necessary data be forwarded to the appropriate authorities of both governments for inclusion in Notices to Mariners."

You agreed but suggested insertion of the phrase "on the Canadian continental shelf" after "Nova Scotia". This proposed entry was submitted to the United States Section of the PJBD for its consideration.

4. The United States State Department has objected to the use of the phrase "on the Canadian continental shelf". It argues that it would be inappropriate for the United States to acquiesce in calling Brown's Bank, at this time, a part of the Canadian continental shelf — pending, first of all, the assertion of a claim by Canada to the continental shelf and, secondly, an agreement between the two Governments to define the boundary of the shelf in the region of Brown's Bank.

5. By virtue of any proposed or reasonable methods of defining the boundary of the shelf the site of the Tower would normally be on that part of the continental shelf which would be under Canadian jurisdiction. Nevertheless it is possible that it might be agreed, in negotiations to define the boundary, that Brown's Bank is on the United States continental shelf, if, for instance, a bargain were struck. To this extent, therefore, the United States opposition to the use of the phrase "on the Canadian continental shelf" is valid.

[28] Voir aussi volume 22, le document 444.
See also Volume 22, Document 444.
[29] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 340.

6. In an attempt to obtain United States acquiescence in our proposal, we suggested, on a tentative basis, that a provision be added to our proposed entry to the effect that the use of the expression "Canadian continental shelf" was not intended to pre-judge the question of the definition of the boundary.

7. Because of our concern about the inference of the action of the United States in building the Tower and the procedure which they might adopt for applying United States laws to the site, we also proposed that these actions should not be construed as pre-judging the future definition of the boundary.

8. The Legal Adviser recently discussed this proposal with a representative of the State Department. The State Department is still opposed to the use of the expression "Canadian continental shelf" and asked if we would reconsider our stand. The State Department would prefer a description of the site using the latitudinal and longitudinal coordinates only.

9. I think we could agree to a "neutral" entry which might simply name the coordinates of the Texas Tower, without prejudicing the Canadian position. The very fact of there being an entry concerning this particular tower in the PJBD Journal infers recognition by the United States of a Canadian interest, no entries having been made in the PJBD Journal in respect of the other more southerly towers.

10. I do believe, however, that if we agree to such an entry we should seek to have a clause included to ensure that any possible future formal action by the United States Government to have United States law apply to the Tower should not be deemed to pre-judge the future definition of the boundary of the shelf. If you agree, and providing Mr. Campney concurs, I suggest that the Secretary of the Canadian Section of the PJBD be instructed to propose the following entry:

"The Board agreed that the establishment of a Texas Tower on Brown's Bank, latitude 42° 46'N, longitude 66° 12'W was needed as an offshore extension of the North American Early Warning System for Air Defence and noted with approval the intention of the U.S. Air Force to construct such a tower. The Board urged that precautions be taken during the construction period to avoid undue damage to the fisheries on Brown's Bank and suggested that at the appropriate time the necessary data be forwarded to the appropriate authorities of both governments for inclusion in Notices to Mariners.

It is understood that neither the erection, establishment and maintenance of the Texas Tower on Brown's Bank nor the application of United States laws thereto is intended to prejudge the delimitation of the boundary of the continental shelf between Canada and the United States which may be established at some future time by agreement between the two Governments."[30]

II. ADDITIONAL REGULAR FORCE AIR DEFENCE SQUADRONS AND BASES

5. The Minister of National Defence recalled that this item had been deferred because it had anticipated that most of the recurring cost would be met from the saving involved in the reduction of the NATO aircrew training plan.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, April 16, 1956 — Document D2-56†).

6. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Most of the facilities proposed in the programme, except for the hangars, would be useful if and when some of these bases were converted to missile (BOMARC) installations. The U.S. had in the planning stage a series of BOMARC installations, running roughly along the 48th parallel, with the possibility that two of these would be in Canada, at North Bay and Ottawa. It could be said, however, that both Canadian and U.S. military authorities felt that for some time to come the air defence would consist of a combination of manned and unmanned fighters. BOMARC appeared to be a good missile but by its very nature it was subject to electronic countermeasures.

(b) The planners of both countries had originally envisaged 18 air defence bases in Canada. The proposal under consideration involved 15. Was there any possibility of the U.S. accelerating pressure for the establishment of three more to bring the total up to the 18 originally considered? In reply, it was said that any such proposal would receive the most searching examination before it was accepted.

(c) The cost of Phase I of the programme could be met from within the scale of present defence expenditures now contemplated, as the aircraft programme contracting and there would be a tapering off of construction and savings in NATO aircrew training. The financing of the programme should be considered in detail with officials of the Department of Finance.

7. The Committee approved the proposal of the Minister of National Defence for increasing the number of regular air force air defence squadrons and bases, and agreed to recommend:

(a) that, in principle, the existing five regular force fighter bases and nine fighter squadrons be increased to fifteen regular squadrons deployed on fifteen air defence bases, the plan to be implemented in two phases;

(b) that authority be given to implement the first phase, which would consist of the formation by May, 1958 of three of these additional CF100 squadrons, the improvement of six existing bases at Bagotville, North Bay, Gimli, Namao, Casey and Val d'Or to bring them up to operational standards as main or satellite bases and the development of three new satellite air defence bases at Kapuskasing, Nakina and Sunstrum, at a total capital cost of $109,752,000 with an annual recurring cost of $36,174,000; it being understood that the funds for these purposes would be found from within the total defence expenditures now contemplated; and

(c) that the site surveys, the preliminary design and the planning required for the bases on which squadrons would be redeployed in phase two of the programme be approved.

III. JOINT SITE SURVEYS FOR THE NORTHWARD EXTENSION OF THE AIR DEFENCE COMBAT ZONE

8. The Minister of National Defence said that with the emergence of the Soviet nuclear weapons and long range jet bombers, U.S. and Canadian air defence commands had been participating actively in plans to improve the defence of the continent so that the retaliatory force of the U.S. Strategic Air Command could be reasonably protected. It was proposed that part of this defence consist of a line of BOMARC missiles from coast to coast crossing the U.S. and Eastern Canada at roughly the 48th parallel. To the north of this would be a line of all-weather interceptor squadrons, the expansion of which had been referred to in the previous item.

To make interceptions, the defending force were entirely dependent upon the control provided by ground radars and computing systems. With the increase in speed and range of possible attackers, the control system should expand beyond the northern fringe of the Pinetree system. In other words, there was a requirement for more heavy radars, the data gathering rate must increase and be continuous, and existing radars must be improved and the means of utilizing information made more automatic. Two courses of action now appeared necessary. First, the effectiveness of the proposed system should be further evaluated and secondly, if the radars were to be available in time to meet the threat, there should be a programme of site surveys. It would be natural to await the evaluation before undertaking the surveys but to do so would mean no progress this summer and the whole project might be set back one year. It would therefore seem sound to proceed with the surveys at this time. It was planned that they be joint Canadian-U.S. undertakings with each party comprising both Canadian and U.S. personnel.

The Minister recommended, on the advice of the Chiefs of Staff, that joint site surveys be conducted throughout Canada during the coming summer without prejudice to any subsequent consideration concerning the ultimate approval, construction and operation of the proposed facilities or the extent of Canadian or U.S. participation in the overall programme.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, June 11, 1956 — Document D6-56†).

9. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) If the recommendation were approved it would mean, in effect, a commitment to an expansion of U.S. facilities in Canada. This general northern movement of continental air defence facilities was inevitable. The U.S. would be asking Canada to undertake heavier burdens in this field or ask that they themselves carry them out or assume a large share. The impact on public opinion of a programme for which the surveys were designed would be very great. It would be desirable to delay approval of it. On the other hand, it was argued that this would not decrease the pressure for improving continental defences but would only shift it in a way which might have more unfortunate effects than otherwise.

(b) The cost of improving detection and control was very great indeed. Canada might do the job if all our forces were withdrawn from Europe. This, however, would have serious repercussions on the alliance. On the other hand, the north was a NATO sector and was becoming more and more vital in the defensive scheme of things. We should be very careful before rejecting the plan which, as could be seen, raised a number of important issues.

(c) Authority was being sought to survey 26 heavy radar sites and over 60 gap fillers, but how many might eventually be constructed was impossible to say at this time. If the investigations could be undertaken under Canadian auspices and if it could be said that they were being carried out to determine the feasibility of pushing the defences northward, the plan would be more palatable than that originally suggested. However, there had to be some U.S. participation, otherwise the U.S. authorities would have no confidence in the results.

(d) The Chiefs of Staff were not yet convinced of the soundness of the project, the manning of which, if it were implemented in full, would involve 15,000-18,000 personnel. The project was for the air defence of North America and not purely the U.S., although the latter would gain most from it since the net overall effect would be to increase the value of the deterrent. The whole programme might cost as much as $1.5 billion.

(e) This kind of defence would be useless in the age of the intercontinental ballistic missile which some thought might arrive on the scene as soon as 1960. If this were the case there would be no point in spending any money on improving detection and control machinery when those improvements would be available just as the missile was operational. It was argued, on the other hand, that the missile could not be available in sufficient quantities until 1965 at the earliest, and a better ground environment system would be necessary before then.

(f) It would not be too expensive for surveys to be undertaken by Canada. They would be done under contract and the numbers of personnel involved would not be too great. A good proportion of the work would consist of the interpretation of aerial photographs already taken.

10. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on proposals for the improvement and extension northward of the Air Defence System of this continent and agreed to recommend that site surveys be authorized, during the 1956 summer season, for additional heavy radars and gap-fillers; such surveys to be conducted under Canadian auspices and at Canadian expense at a cost of approximately $500,000 with such participation by as many U.S. personnel as may be necessary, it being understood that this decision would not in any way imply approval of the provision of any additional facilities or of the extent to which Canada or the United States, or both countries jointly, might participate in the programme.

TELEGRAM 1721 Washington, September 20, 1956

Reference: DL547 Mar 23.†
For Under-Secretary

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

At his request, I called yesterday on Burke Elbrick, Acting Assistant Secretary for European Affairs. Air Commodore Cameron and Glazebrook went with me, and Elbrick had with him General Loper (Assistant to the Secretary of Defence for Atomic Energy), Farley from the Office of the Adviser on Atomic Energy in the State Department, and Parsons, the Director of the British Commonwealth and Northern European Office.

2. I found on arrival that Elbrick wished to raise the question I anticipated in my telegram 498 of March 16† and to do so in the informal manner suggested in paragraph 3 of your telegram DL529 of March 21. The suggestions and the explanation made were virtually those informally indicated to the CJS in January.

3. The new weapons, Elbrick explained, called for a reconsideration of this aspect of continental defence. Nuclear weapons for continental defence would soon be available, and first in the form of air-to-air guided missiles with atomic warheads. These were considered to be suitable since tests showed a high probability of destruction. (The RCAF will be aware of the weapons and equipment involved) and papers on this subject have recently been forwarded to Ottawa by the CJS.

4. It followed, Elbrick suggested, that there should be now consideration of the integration of these weapons into the continental defence plans. The necessary political "pre-authority" for use of such weapons over USA territory had been given by the President. The USA legal authorization would now permit of training of Canadian personnel but would not, however, extend to custody of atomic weapons on Canadian soil except by USA personnel, for which amendment to the law would be needed.

5. A period of years is anticipated for the development of a situation in which atomic weapons would be integrated into continental defence. The first stage would involve air-to-air missiles, and the overflying of Canadian territory by USA aircraft armed with atomic weapons. Later it would be necessary to discuss arrangements for ground-to-air missiles launched from USA soil. It will be necessary, too, to examine the forces required, bases, training of Canadian personnel, and joint rules of engagement.

6. Having outlined the matters to be examined, Elbrick asked for Canadian views on the means by which this examination should be made. He mentioned that there were a number of bilateral bodies one or more of which could be employed, but preferred that suggestions on procedure should come from the Canadian Government. I made no comments on this point except to suggest that whatever machinery is adopted for immediate purposes should be one suitable for successive stages of atomic questions for air defence.

7. There are obviously some difficult aspects to this proposal, as have already been indicated in the memo prepared by Mr. Bryce (your telegram DL547 March 23). One element in this situation perhaps is the desirability of relating the various questions concerning continental defence which have in one manner or another been raised. One of these for example, is integrated command. However, the immediate subject of this telegram is in itself difficult enough. I did indicate at our discussion in the State Department that if the USA administration placed so much emphasis on the importance of employing atomic weapons in Air Defence, it would seem to be in their interest to adjust their own legal position so as to avoid restrictions which would at best offer difficulties to the Canadian Government. The American comments on this were sympathetic but vague.

8. My only suggestion at this stage is that no quick decision should be made on procedure for further discussion. There is obviously an important technical side which could be discussed only by experts. On the other hand, you may be reluctant to initiate a process which would perhaps in a year or more bring us up against policy problems which might perhaps better be solved before the technical studies launched us into an almost set course. I would welcome your preliminary thinking on this matter, but I would not anticipate a decision on procedure until the whole question has been examined in Ottawa from the various points of view involved.

Dear Mr. Bryce,

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE: USE OF ATOMIC ANTI-AIRCRAFT WEAPONS OVER CANADA

Attached is a copy of telegram No. 1721 of September 20 from our Ambassador in Washington. In his message Mr. Heeney reported that the United States authorities had made the informal approach on the above subject which we have anticipated since last winter.

This matter has most important political and military implications and I agree with Mr. Heeney that no quick decision should be made on procedure for further discussion. Indeed, before putting forward suggestions on procedure and before coming to grips with the political aspects of the matter, I feel that we should have more details on its military and technical aspects. While entirely agreeing with Mr. Heeney's word of caution lest discussions of the technical side by experts "indicate a process which would perhaps in a year or more bring us up against policy problems which might perhaps better be solved before the technical studies launched us into an almost set course", I feel that there would be considerable advantage to be gained by arranging for an ad hoc meeting of experts from the RCAF and the United States Air Force in order to obtain more technical detail as to exactly what is involved in the United States proposal.

After the required clarification had been obtained through inter-Air Force channels, we would be in a better position to make suggestions to the United States authorities regarding the procedure for further discussion. In this connection, I feel that this problem should not be treated as an isolated matter but rather as part of the general problem of the air defence of North America. I am asking General Foulkes, to whom I am sending a copy of the attached telegram, how he thinks it can best be arranged to obtain through Air Force channels the information needed.

I think it desirable that you and General Foulkes and I meet before long to discuss the whole question. I have made a similar suggestion to General Foulkes.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Léger:

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

With reference to your letter of 24 September† and the attached telegram from Mr. Heeney regarding the United States informal approach on the use of atomic anti-aircraft weapons over Canada.

In Washington last Thursday I discussed this matter informally with Mr. Heeney, and, as you are aware, we gave this subject a preliminary examination prior to the Prime Minister's visit with the President at White Sulphur Springs last April. I entirely agree with you that this is a very difficult and complicated political and military problem and all aspects of it should be carefully studied before we ask the government to take decisions.

As you will realize, this problem is very closely associated with the question of the control of air defence forces, which is now being studied by a special Study Group set up by the two Chiefs of Air Staff. My preliminary examination of this problem leads me to believe that we will not be able to give a firm answer regarding procedure until we have ascertained the results of this study of command and control.

In your absence, I have had a talk with Mr. Bryce on this subject and we suggest that it should be placed on the agenda of a Chiefs of Staff meeting to be held at 1000 hours on Wednesday, 3 October, at which time we could have a preliminary discussion. It is my intention to circulate to the Chiefs Mr. Heeney's telegram together with a copy of your letter and my reply and a copy of the aide mémoire prepared by Mr. Bryce and myself for the Prime Minister's information at the meeting at White Sulphur Springs.

Would you let me know earliest whether you agree to this matter being discussed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting next Wednesday, and whether you would find it convenient to attend.

Yours sincerely,
CHARLES FOULKES

AGENDA ITEM 4, 597TH MEETING OF CHIEFS, 3 OCTOBER 1956

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

In your letter of September 24 to General Foulkes, which is one of the documents to be considered under this item, you expressed the view that "there would be considerable advantage to be gained by arranging for an ad hoc meeting of experts from the RCAF and the United States Air Force in order to obtain more technical details as to exactly what is involved in the United States proposal".

2. On reflection, I wonder whether even a technical meeting of this kind should take place without the approval of the Cabinet Defence Committee, or even the full Cabinet. I think that, in a matter of this importance, with its many political and military implications, it is most desirable that no step should be taken by officials, without specific authority from the Government, which might be interpreted as negotiation rather than as fact-finding or which might later be construed by the U.S. authorities as implying tacit approval of any aspect of their proposal. Mr. Heeney, in his letter of April 6 to Mr. Pearson, strongly expressed fears of this kind, with regard both to the inter-service talks which had been inaugurated on the possible integration of operational control of the continental air defences, and to the procedure for dealing with any proposals for the use of atomic weapons over or in Canada.

3. A Memorandum to Cabinet might at this stage merely inform the Ministers of the U.S. approach on the basis of Mr. Heeney's message of April 6 and request authority for the RCAF to conduct exploratory conversations at the technical level as suggested in your letter of September 24 to General Foulkes. When this further information has been obtained, consideration should be given to preparing another comprehensive brief on developments in continental air defence of the kind which was given to Ministers when they considered the CF-105 programme a year ago.

Chief of the Air Staff (Air Marshal Slemon)
Chief of the General Staff (Lieutenant-General Graham)
Chief of the Naval Staff (Vice Admiral DeWolf)
Acting Chairman, Defence Research Board (Dr. Field)

Also Present

F.R. Miller, Esq., Deputy Minister National Defence.
R.B. Bryce, Esq., Secretary to the Cabinet.
J. Léger, Esq., Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.
G. Ignatieff, Esq., Department of External Affairs.
Brigadier Rothschild, Coordinator Joint Staff.
Secretary, Chiefs of Staff (Captain Lucas).

I. CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

1. The Committee had for consideration correspondence between the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff and the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, concerning continental defence and the use of atomic anti-aircraft weapons over Canada.

(CSC:1855.1 of 26 September 1956).

2. The Chairman reported to the Committee that this matter had been raised informally some months ago by U.S. authorities. During his recent visit to Washington he had had some further discussion on the subject, with the Chairman, U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, who fully realized the difficult political problem raised for Canada and also the fact that implementation would require changes in U.S. legislation.

3. General Foulkes stated that he considered this was a problem which needed a most careful approach and that it would be unwise to place the matter before Cabinet until every angle had been explored. The present discussions on integrated control of air defence with their implication of U.S. control over part of the Canadian airspace was inextricably involved with the problem under discussion. It was his opinion that the Chiefs of Staff had insufficient information to come to any conclusions on this subject and he suggested that the Chief of the Air Staff arrange for a briefing of the Chiefs of Staff on all aspects of the problem to include:

(a) over flights of Canadian territory by the USAF;

(b) the airspace in Canada which at the present time could only be defended by the USAF;

(c) an outline of the proposals for integrated control of air defence;

(d) the size, range and effect of atomic warheads;

(e) the timing of the introduction of air-to-air missiles into both the RCAF and the USAF;

(f) the timing of the introduction of ground-to-air missiles;

(g) limitations of both US and Canadian law on the use of atomic weapons.

4. The Chief of the Air Staff reported that the study on integrated control was progressing satisfactorily although not yet completed. He entirely agreed with the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, that the matter under discussion should be proceeded with great caution and suggested that any agreement which might be entered into with the United States should include complete exchange of information on atomic defensive missiles. While there had been continued improvement in the exchange of operational information concerning such missiles, technical information which would allow an appreciation of the risks involved in the use of such weapons was still not available.

5. The Deputy Minister considered that there were two distinct problems involved:

(a) what arrangements should be made with the U.S., who now have atomic weapons of this category;

(b) whether Canada intends to develop atomic weapons for defensive purposes.

6. Mr. Léger was of the opinion that, especially since discussions with the Americans would involve a requirement to change the present U.S. law regarding the exchange of atomic information, certain appropriate Ministers should be briefed on the proposals and their authority sought before any discussions were arranged with U.S. authorities.

7. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff stated that the present requirement was not so much to reach agreement with the United States as to decide what were the appropriate channels for carrying out discussions on this matter.

8. The Committee agreed to request the Chief of the Air Staff to arrange a briefing of the Chiefs of Staff concerning this subject at an early date.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

For the Under-Secretary, Begins: Air Commodore Cameron has given me a copy of a telegram he has sent today to Air Force headquarters on the above subject. This telegram reads as follows:

"You are no doubt aware communication passed from Defense to Canada via State and External subject introduction atomic capability USA Air Defense Forces. Up until now was not aware that any urgency attached to negotiations but today informed that ADC will have atomic capability as from 01 Jan 1957 and USA desirous of making some official announcement around that time.

"2. In view of above USAF consider it desirable have matter on agenda next PJBD meeting if this is to be forum for negotiation and meanwhile think it would be profitable make informal presentation to any panel in Ottawa whom you think should be informed with object of facilitating discussions and arriving at interim understanding in PJBD.

"3. As I see it immediate problem is one of permission overfly on operational missions to be followed by discussions leading to rearmament of USAF aircraft in Canada and employment by RCAF.

"4. Will have further discussions with Coiner with view isolating problem areas but meanwhile you might advise your reaction to schedule outlined para two. Also suggest you advise External of increased priority on problem with view expediting official reply to State Department.

"5. I have discussed this matter with Ambassador in view contents of his wire 1721 dated September 20 to External, in particular paragraph 8, and am passing him a copy."

2. It now appears that we shall be called upon to give more urgent consideration to this question than first anticipated. Accordingly, I shall be grateful to receive your comments and any instructions you may consider necessary. Ends.

TOP SECRET. NO CIRCULATION. Ottawa, November 12, 1956

Dear General Foulkes,

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Attached is a copy of a telegram from the Canadian Embassy, Washington, No. 2044 of November 9, containing the text of a message from Air Commodore Cameron to Air Force Headquarters on the subject of the introduction of atomic capability in the U.S.A. air defence forces. I assume this message has reached you through the military channel.

2. However, I take this opportunity of making certain comments and proposals on this message which obviously has considerable urgency in view of the time factor reported. First, it is proposed by the USAF that the matter should be considered at the next PJBD meeting. This question of what might be the most appropriate forum for discussions will have to be put to Ministers, but I suggest that an immediate decision is not required. What seems to be most urgent is that all available information about U.S. plans should be available to the Canadian Government in advance of the official announcement by the United States authorities reported to be contemplated for the first of January, 1957.

3. Therefore I hope that you would agree that as the next step arrangements should be made urgently for the briefing of the Chiefs of Staff which I understand is already contemplated. We would see advantages in accepting the U.S. offer and having them make their "informal presentation" to the Chiefs. Such a briefing would then enable the Chiefs to brief Ministers on this problem at a meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee.

4. However, having in mind the important political implications of this subject and the desirability of avoiding the possibility of misunderstanding that the acceptance of such a briefing might pre-judge the attitude of Ministers to the whole question of the introduction of the atomic capability in continental defence, I suggest that further correspondence with the U.S. authorities, including acceptance of an informal presentation to the Chiefs of Staff should be conducted through the diplomatic channel, i.e. through Mr. Heeney and the State Department.

ATOMIC CAPABILITY IN AIR DEFENCE

1. Following for Heeney from Macdonnell: In view of the sensitivity of this subject Cameron's instructions† are being sent to him by hand of an officer. He has been instructed to inform you of the contents of his instructions.

2. The Chiefs of Staff are requesting the USAF to brief them any day during the week November 19-23 except 22 November (when Gruenther will be here). It is hoped that after this briefing recommendations can be made to the Government on what further steps should be taken to reach a decision on the problem.

3. We believe you should keep the State Department informed of developments. As we suggested in our telegram under reference we believe you should tell the State Department that we are giving active consideration to the question of what might be the best forum for the continuing examination of this question but that no decision has been reached as yet on the point. You should stress as well that the briefing which the USAF will be giving in Ottawa should in no sense be regarded as negotiations. On the Canadian side we are solely interested in acquiring the further information which is essential if this subject is to be carried further.

4. In a sense your approach to the State Department should be treated as an interim response to the USA approach made on September 19 and which was dealt with in your telegram 1721 of September 20. Admittedly you cannot carry the subject much further at this point but its complexity and importance require that it be handled very cautiously. We are interested as we know you are in having the State Department participate in discussions of this subject as they progress.

5. In your telegram 1721 of September 20 you relate this question of atomic capability to that of the problem of integrated command. You should be aware that in the last few days a sub-committee of the military study group has completed a study[31] and has concluded that in order to provide the most effective air defence of North America the operational control of the Air Defence Forces of Canada and the USA should be integrated and should be delegated to a single commander. The conclusions of this relatively low level body have of course a good deal of processing before them. Some informal attention was given to this subject at the special meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee held November 15. While you should be aware of these developments it is clear that the subject has not progressed far enough to be discussed with the State Department. If in the course of any discussions you have with the State Department on the subject in hand this matter of integrated control arises we believe your comments should be non-committal at this stage.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Following from Macdonnell, Begins: Chiefs of Staff with Bryce and myself present were briefed today.

2. Briefers emphasized:

(a) Extremely limited use of weapon proposed by USAF i.e. engagement of aircraft which is not merely possibly hostile but is almost certainly hostile. Briefers stated that up to the present even if USAF had possessed this weapon no occasion has arisen on which they would have sent up an aircraft armed with it. Proposal is further limited in that it involves only one sector in Canada north of a base in Michigan.

(b) Numerous and complicated safety features designed to prevent full explosion except when target engaged. The worst that could happen accidentally (e.g. should there be a crash or should a weapon fall off) would be a detonation of high explosive. This could cause slight contamination of a small area where the components landed. Decontamination measures were described as simple.

3. In putting the question before ministers the following points appear important:

(a) Extremely limited use proposed.

(b) Safe features. USAF will arrange for RCAF team of experts to examine most of the safety devices with a view to enabling the Chief of the Air Staff to assure ministers that safety measures are satisfactory.

(c) Adequate arrangements to be made for immediate notification to the Canadian authorities at a high level if an aircraft thus armed is sent into Canadian Air.

[31] La version finale de cette étude a été réimprimée sous le document 41.
The final version of this study is reprinted as Document 41.

(d) Adequate arrangements to be made for disposal and decontamination in case of accident. USAF are willing to train RCAF personnel and would remove debris promptly.

(e) Coordination of public statements in the United States and Canada.

4. It was agreed at the meeting (and the U.S. briefers informed) that the quickest way to present the problem to ministers would be to prepare a draft exchange of notes embodying minimum United States requirements, stressing limited use and possibly including a reference to safety features. It was further agreed that this could best be done in Washington by the Embassy (including Cameron who attended the meeting) with the USAF and the State Department. It was emphasized to the briefers that this procedure implied no Canadian commitment at this stage and was simply a rapid technique for submitting a proposal to ministers in concrete terms. At the same time it was made clear that service chiefs and civil officials viewed the proposals sympathetically.

5. Would you therefore endeavour as soon as possible to draft and send us an exchange of notes satisfactory to the USAF and the State Department bearing in mind the considerations in paragraph three above. Ends.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE ATOMIC CAPABILITY

We learned, only on December 13, that a meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee would be held on Wednesday, December 19. To our surprise we learned as well that the Department of National Defence plan to submit to Cabinet Defence Committee recommendations on the subject of the introduction of nuclear capability into the continental air defence system. The memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee on the subject was not available at the time of writing this memorandum (December 14). We were promised a copy of it, however, as soon as it was available.

2. It was our understanding that a submission to Cabinet Defence Committee on this subject would await developments in Washington where our Embassy was to work out with United States authorities a draft exchange of notes. The Embassy was to reach agreement as well with United States authorities on the question of timing of the public release planned by the American authorities of information concerning the introduction of nuclear capability into the air defence system. We made this point to Colonel Raymont in the office Chairman, Chiefs of Staff. He informed us, however, that the Deputy Minister of National Defence believed it essential that a recommendation on the subject should go to Cabinet Defence Committee next week.

3. Under the circumstances we thought it best to call the Embassy today. We spoke to Mr. Rae and asked him to let us have by Monday, December 17, a progress report on the status of the Embassy's negotiations with the State Department in this field. Mr. Rae said that the Embassy would sound out the State Department over the weekend, without making any reference to the possibility that the subject would be considered by Canadian Ministers in the near future. We stressed the importance of reaching agreement with the Americans, so as to prevent a sudden, unexpected public release in Washington before we were prepared for it here.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Nugent asked us to call at the State Department this morning to give us the text of the draft note embodying the Pentagon's proposals.

2. The following is the text of the draft note (which is classified "Secret"):

"I have the honor to refer to conversations between representatives of our two governments, which were commenced in the State Department last September, regarding the proposed incorporation of nuclear weapons in USA-Canadian air defense arrangements. Needless to say, such a move would greatly enhance the joint defense capabilities which our two countries have been developing over a period of years.

"As has already been indicated to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee, the initial nuclear capability visualized for air defense will be in the form of an air-to-air rocket (MB-1). This weapon will be issued around January 1/57, to the USA Air Force in small numbers for use in air-defense activities. In order that this new weapon may be given maximum scope in defense activities which affect both Canada and the USA, this Government wishes to propose that the MB-1 be carried by USA military aircraft over Canada under the following terms and conditions:

"1) The initial period during which the Canadian Government will authorize the carriage of MB-1 weapons over Canada will extend for six months from January 1/57 to July 1/57, by which time it is hoped that a more permanent arrangement will have been worked out by the two governments. USA airforce planes so armed will enter Canadian air space only in the event an air defense warning yellow or red is declared. In such an event, the USA planes will largely confine their activities to Canadian territory bordering on the Great Lakes and extending northward to about 50 degrees North latitude. USA planes armed with MB-1 weapons, under air defense warning yellow or red, will be authorized by the Canadian Government to land at, or take off from, Canadian bases in the territory over which they have authority to operate.

"2) In the circumstances visualized above, rules of interception and engagement over Canadian territory shall continue to be those established from time to time by the Canadian Government for interceptor aircraft of the Royal Canadian Air Force operating over Canada. Attached for your info is a copy of the USA interception and engagement instructions and procedures which have been reviewed for their applicability to the employment of atomic weapons and which will become applicable on January 1/57.

"3) The USA Government has taken the utmost precaution in designing the weapon, and will exercise equal precaution in establishing operational procedures, to insure a minimum possibility of public hazard when employment of the MB-1 is necessary. Representatives of the Royal Canadian Air Force have been thoroughly informed by the USA Air Force concerning safety features.

"4) In accordance with current agreed procedures, crashes of aircraft from either country in the territory of the other are reported on a service-to-service bases. During the term of this agreement, the USA will take measures to insure that the Canadian Government is immediately notified of any crash in Canadian territory of a USA aircraft carrying MB-1 rockets.

"5) Detailed arrangements will be made between the USA Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force to provide designated RCAF personnel with training necessary for the salvage of MB-1 weapons following an accident. In the event salvage is necessary, the US Air Force is willing to send at any time, upon request, trained personnel to assist in the operation.

"6) The USA Government is now formulating an info program for use in insuring the best public relations possible. Any info released jointly or separately by the two governments concerning this subject will be processed in accordance with the current understanding of March 19/51, which governs the release of publicity relating to joint Canadian-USA defense plans and operations.

"If these conditions are acceptable to your government, I suggest that this note and your reply shall constitute an agreement effective from the date of your reply.

"Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration."

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Although we have not had sufficient time to study the draft note carefully, there are one or two points which occur to us and have no doubt occurred to you.

2. The general line of the draft seems fairly satisfactory although it does not always reflect the precision of the four points contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram GG3 November 21. Point A concerning the extremely limited use proposed is implicit in the second sentence of the first numbered paragraph. Point B is covered in part in numbered paragraph 3; instead of arranging for an RCAF team of experts to examine most of the safety devices it states that representatives of the RCAF have been thoroughly informed concerning them. Point C is referred to in numbered paragraph one but hardly in a satisfactory manner. (See paragraph four below.) Point D is dealt with in numbered paragraphs 4 and 5 and point E in numbered paragraph 6.

3. In numbered paragraph one, where it is stated that "USA airforce planes so armed will enter Canadian air space only in the event of an air defence warning yellow or red is declared", it is not specified by whom such a warning should be declared. We assume that you would wish this point clarified and your own comments on the draft note will either suggest alternative language or put forward a proposal to remove doubts on the subject. The only comment that we would make in this connection is that this points up the necessity of an early agreement on the subject of alerts (our despatch 1748 December 5)[32] and you will no doubt wish to take Murphy's two letters into consideration when formulating your own comments on the draft.

4. In the same numbered paragraph it seems to be implicit that USA aircraft, once a yellow or red warning has been declared, will automatically be authorized by the Canadian Government to "land at or take off from Canadian bases in the territory over which they have authority to operate." No provision is made for prior consultation in the event that time would allow it as would certainly seem desirable.

5. On publicity, Nugent outlined to us the general thinking at the present moment. The public announcement to be made would be in very general terms emphasizing capability and would not refer to any individual country. It would be made after the distribution of the weapon to USA units had begun to avoid the possibility of press scoops. No date has yet been set for the announcement but the Air Force still hope to be in a position to commence delivery soon after January 1. The announcement will take the form of a routine release by an appropriate government agency or a possible combination of agencies. It will not be made in any speech or press conference, or what Nugent termed a "special oral pronouncement." Nugent also said that the present plan calls for us to be given the text of the announcement "reasonably in advance" and he hopes that this would be as much as two weeks. The text of the announcement is now being prepared in the Pentagon and although the intention is that it should receive approval from the White House before being shown to us, Nugent thought that if we so requested it would be possible to hold working level consultations before the text becomes "frozen".

I. CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON OVERFLIGHTS

1. The Minister of National Defense said that by January 1st next certain United States Air Force air defence interceptor aircraft would be fitted with air-to-air atomic weapons. An existing agreement between Canada and the U.S. allowed aircraft of either country near the border to overfly the other's territory in making interceptions of suspected enemy aircraft. The U.S. now sought authority to make such interceptions, under certain conditions, carrying these weapons. The aircraft so fitted would only be committed to making an interception when it was definitely established that a hostile aircraft had entered the air defence system.

A group of Canadian scientists and operational officers had, on the invitation of the U.S.A.F., examined the weapon and reported that the safety devices were adequate to prevent premature or accidental discharge. Furthermore, if an aircraft carrying one of these weapons crashed, or if a weapon was inadvertently dropped, the maximum hazard would be the possible detonation of 200 pounds of high explosive which might scatter the nuclear material over an area about 500 feet square. Only a minor radiation hazard would result and the U.S.A.F. would be willing to decontaminate such an area immediately and were prepared to train Canadians to carry out similar decontamination.

The Chiefs of Staff recommended that interim arrangements be made to meet the U.S. request, pending the making of permanent arrangements after the problem had been studied further. The conditions proposed were that aircraft carrying these weapons would not be used for initial identification interceptions, that they would be used only when it had been definitely established that probably hostile aircraft had entered the system, and that the weapons would not be fired except at a confirmed hostile aircraft. They also recommended that procedures be worked out with the U.S.A.F. for the exchange of information on these interceptions and for the decontamination of areas should this be necessary. A press announcement was also suggested.

He concurred in these recommendations as a temporary measure, pending permanent arrangements after a six-month period.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Dec. 17, 1956 — Document D18-56;† Telegram 2314 of Dec. 17 from Washington was circulated at the meeting).

2. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The U.S. authorities had pointed out that up to the present there had never been an occasion when these weapons would have been carried over the United States or Canada.

(b) The U.S. proposed to make an announcement early in the new year concerning the equipment of their interceptors with these atomic weapons and it was thought advisable that Canada should also issue an announcement describing this new capability and pointing out that there was very little danger arising from it. It would be desirable to confine the Canadian announcement to this aspect of the matter and not stress the question of overflights.

(c) Canada would be arming its forces with the most modern equipment if it were available. Since it was not, and since the defence of the continent was integrated, it was only to be expected that the U.S. should undertake this task. Eventually, if the U.S. law were changed, the U.S. might offer to sell similar weapons to Canada and R.C.A.F. aircraft would be equipped with them. Indeed, Canadians would probably be surprised if the request were refused.

(d) The question was whether an announcement should be made concerning this development, or whether the government should wait until questions were asked about it. The public was aware of the fact that there was an agreement on overflights now and had probably assumed that the aircraft concerned were carrying atomic weapons anyway. On the other hand, the U.S. Air Defence Commander had made a statement about a year ago concerning this possibility which had aroused a good deal of interest, and it might be advisable to issue an official statement when the new development occurred. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to have a statement prepared and ready to be issued if necessary.

(e) Interceptions by aircraft armed with these rockets would only be initiated on yellow or red warnings. Yellow warnings could occur almost any time. In fact, one had almost been declared in Alaska a few days previously.

(f) An announcement should include explanations concerning storage of weapons, the conditions under which interceptions might take place, precautions, and so forth. The more difficult question to explain would be why Canada had to rely on the U.S. to defend us with this type of weapon when they were not prepared to let us have any of them.

(g) If the conventional forces in Europe were reduced in strength, the Europeans would insist on having the most modern atomic weapons at their disposal. When this occurred, the very difficult problem of who would decide when these would be used would be raised.

3. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the request of the United States to make interceptions over Canada with aircraft carrying air-to-air atomic weapons, and agreed to recommend that:

(a) pending permanent arrangements, the United States Air Force be authorized, for a six-month period, to fly such aircraft armed with these missiles over Canadian territory, under the conditions proposed by the Minister of National Defence;

(b) procedures be prepared for the exchange of information on interceptions and for the decontamination of areas should one of these weapons be accidentally dropped; and

(c) a press announcement on the matter be drafted, but issued only if this was subsequently thought to be desirable.[33]

Huitième rapport du groupe d'études militaires du Canada et des États-Unis

SECRET [Ottawa], December 19, 1956

1. As directed by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, an Ad Hoc Group within the framework of the Canada-U.S. Military Study Group undertook a study of the problem of integration of operational control of the continental air defences of Canada and the United States in peacetime. A copy of the Ad Hoc Group's Report is enclosed.

2. The Canada-U.S. Military Study Group has examined this report in detail and supports the conclusions contained therein. The Canada-U.S. Military Study Group, therefore, recommends that:

(a) The conclusions contained in the Ad Hoc Group's Report be approved as the basic principles on which the integrated operational control of the air defences of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska be undertaken; and

(b) The Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff take action to secure the approval of both governments for the integration of the operational control of the Canadian and United States air defences in accordance with the concepts contained in the Ad Hoc Group's Report.

3. No implementing recommendations are being made at this time. If the above recommendations receive approval, further detailed planning will be required. This is particularly true with regard to the terms of reference of the Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence Canada and the United States (CINCADCANUS), and the internal organization, including geographical boundaries. It is the opinion of the MSG that further action in this regard should await approval, at least in principle, of the above recommendations.

SECRET

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF THE CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCES OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES IN PEACETIME(S)

The Problem

1. To study and make recommendations concerning the integration of operational control of the continental air defence of Canada and the United States in peacetime.

Facts Bearing on the Problem

2. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have agreed that it is desirable to study methods of integrating in peacetime the operational control of continental elements of the air defence forces of both countries. They have agreed that this study be undertaken by an ad hoc group of United States and Canadian officers of the three Services under the Canada-United States Military Study Group.

3. In the Canada-United States Emergency Defence Plan (MCC 300/8), which supports the Canada-United States Basic Security Plan, approved by the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee, the following planning directive is set out: "Air defence plans should be based upon the concept that the air defence of Canada and the United States is a single problem and that plans for the use of air defence resources of Canada and the United States must be developed on a combined basis so as to provide the most effective defence possible for agreed vital targets."

4. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff have suggested that the ad hoc group should limit its discussions and recommendations to the problems of operational control.

5. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have concluded that the peacetime continental air defence arrangement should provide for:

(a) The operational integration of the continental elements of the air defence systems of both countries including continental portions of the warning systems;

(b) The centralization of authority for operational control of the continental-based forces of both countries assigned and such augmentation forces which may otherwise be allocated to continental air defence; and

(c) Ready adaptability to meet conditions imposed in the event of a general war or at such times as may be mutually agreeable.

(d) The operational control of the air defence forces in Alaska by an Air Defence Force as a part of an integrated air defence system for the United States and Canada.

(e) Developing and exercising such a system for the integration of operational control of the continental air defences of Canada and the United States over a period of years in order to be effective when needed and not require major adjustment in a transition from a peacetime to a general war status.

6. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff also consider the possibility that a commander of one nationality may exercise operational control over subordinate combat forces of the other nation should not be a governing factor in developing combined recommendations on the optimum arrangement for integrating the operational control of the Canadian and United States air defences.

7. The United States Continental Air Defense Command is a joint command established by the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, composed of the USAF Air Defense Command, the Army Antiaircraft Command, and Naval Forces CONAD. Operational control of forces assigned or otherwise made available is exercised through joint subordinate commanders.

8. At present, the USAF Air Defense Command is composed of 63 fighter interceptor squadrons stationed at 43 bases in the United States. These forces are organized into air defence divisions assigned to Eastern, Central, and Western Air Defence Forces. Other USAF combat forces include six fighter interceptor squadrons stationed at two main and several subsidiary bases in Alaska and three fighter interceptor squadrons in the Northeast area. These are all under the operational control of the Commander-in-Chief, Continental Air Defence Command (CINCONAD), with headquarters at Colorado Springs, Colorado, except those fighter squadrons based in Canada, which come under the operational control of the Air Officer Commanding, RCAF Air Defence Command, by international agreement.

9. The United States Army Antiaircraft Command, also under the operational control of the CINCONAD has 87 antiaircraft battalions (49 NIKE 1, 28 gun and 10 Skysweeper). These forces are organized into five regional commands and deployed for the defence of thirty critical localities in the United States and Greenland. There are in addition three gun and two skysweeper battalions defending installations in Alaska.

10. The combat elements of the United States Naval Forces CONAD consist principally of air augmentation forces which are made temporarily available to CINCONAD in an emergency. Their number, composition, and location will vary from time to time depending on Naval operations.

11. The RCAF Air Defence Command has nine operational squadrons of fighter aircraft stationed at five bases in Canada, all of which are subordinate to the Air Defence Command, Royal Canadian Air Force, with headquarters at St. Hubert, Quebec, Canada.

12. The Distant Early Warning Line, backed up by the Mid-Canada Line will constitute the basic early warning system. The surveillance and control system made up of contiguous radar sites, gap filler radars, and the radar of the extension to seaward of the contiguous radar system (Texas Towers, picket ships, blimps, AEW&C Aircraft) provides the means by which the air picture is continually assessed and the air defence battle is directed. This system is currently operating as a manual system with principal dependence on the human element for the processing and passage of information. The United States has programmed a Semi-Automatic Ground Environment (SAGE) system to substitute electronic means for the present manual procedure in passing information and directing air defence forces. For similar purposes and for use in conjunction with SAGE, the U.S. Army has programmed an electronic information passing and fire direction means (Missile Master) for the operation of its surface-to-air missile units.

13. United States Air Force plans provide for the modernization of units as new equipment becomes available and for an increase in air defence units as follows:

(a) Fighter Interceptor Squadrons—71 (FY 1960)

(b) BOMARC Squadrons—40 (FY 1961-1965)

(c) TALOS Squadrons—8 (FY 1961-1965)

14. The Royal Canadian Air Force plans to expand its forces to twelve fighter squadrons by fiscal year 1960 with a possible further expansion of three squadrons or, alternatively, to add two BOMARC units later. The RCAF also plans to convert to CF 105 type aircraft commencing fiscal year 1960.

15. The United States Army plans to expand its antiaircraft forces in Alaska, Northeast Area, and the Continental United States to 142 active Army battalions (90 NIKE, 2 Gun, 35 Hawk, and 15 Skysweeper) by the end of fiscal year 1960.

16. At present, emergency operations in air defence of Canada and the United States would be conducted on the basis of the "Canada-United States Emergency Air Defence Plan (CANUEADP 2-56)" which was prepared jointly by Headquarters, Continental Air Defence Command, Air Defence Command (RCAF), the U.S. Alaskan Command, and U.S. Northeast Command in support of the Canada-United States Emergency Defence Plan. This plan includes the "Agreed Cross Border Intercept and Engagement Procedures", and the "RCAF Air Staff Instructions for Intercept and Engagements."

Discussions

17. With the advent of high yield nuclear weapons and the rapid improvement in the means of effecting their delivery, the problems of air defence become more complex. Not only must a high percentage of enemy delivery vehicles be destroyed because of the lethality of the nuclear bombs, but also the increased speed of enemy delivery systems has reduced the time available for interception within a defined distance. To counter this threat, air defence weapons must be able to commence their attacks as early as possible and to keep the enemy force under constant attack to achieve maximum destruction of the attacking force before it penetrates the vital areas. This requirement to have defence in depth necessitates having a contiguous radar control and warning system as far in advance of the target areas as is practicable and weapons deployed at locations and so controlled as to ensure that the maximum rate of interception can be applied against an enemy attack regardless of avenue of approach. As the number of weapons which can be brought to bear on an attacking force within a given space and time period is restricted by the control capability of the air defence system and the characteristics of the varied weapons systems, weapons must be assigned at the optimum rate beginning at the edge of radar cover. To achieve this optimum rate in many areas, some weapons based in the United States must be employed over Canadian air space and vice versa. This becomes increasingly more important with the introduction of longer range weapons and automatic control systems which, to be fully effective, cannot be restricted by international boundaries.

18. At present, various agreements between Canada and the United States do provide for cross border intercepts and rules of engagement, and procedures do exist which would permit forces from one country to reinforce forces of the other country. However, the high speed of the enemy threat, the longer range of weapons, and the automaticity of air defence control systems demand split second decisions to keep pace with the speed and tempo of future air battles. This demand for split second decisions cannot be accomplished under the present arrangements of coordinated command which require consultation between national commanders before implementation. The present arrangements do not, therefore, provide for the authoritative control of all weapons which can profitably be employed against a hostile target. Effective use of all available weapons can only be accomplished by someone who has sufficient information of the over-all air defence situation to make these split second decisions required to use forces to the best advantage. Therefore, there is a need for the individual commanders who must actually fight the air battle to have all necessary tactical information and authority to employ effectively all weapons which can be brought to bear upon a target. Further, at higher echelons, commanders must have the necessary information and authority to effect immediate reinforcements between commanders at lower levels, regardless of nationality, and to control the air battle over wide areas.

19. The flexibility of employment of forces and the split second decisions necessitated by the tempo of the air battle can only be achieved by decentralization of control under a single authority responsible for the operational control of all forces available for the air defence of North America. This principle of collective security through the medium of a single chain of operational control is well established in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization where SACEUR, SACLANT, etc., have operational control over all assigned forces. It is equally important that this same principle should apply to the direction of the air defence of North America.

20. While it has been agreed in MCC 300/8 that the air defence of both countries must be considered a single problem, there is neither the authority nor the means for dealing with it as a single problem. Although the Canada-United States Emergency Air Defence Plan (CANUSEADP 2-56) is a combined plan which does, in some measure, prescribe the operational procedures to be used jointly in an emergency, it was not intended to integrate the operational control of the continental air defence forces, but seeks primarily to coordinate separate Canadian and United States plans. Also in an attempt to achieve closer coordination in planning, an RCAF liaison planning group is attached to CONAD HQ, and although this group has proved invaluable for producing combined air defence studies, the plans based on these studies are national plans which are seldom coordinated at any time after the original conception. Thus, the present means for considering the air defence of both countries as a single problem are inadequate for the following reasons:

(a) Despite the close cooperation between the two governments an authoritative document which outlines a desirable pattern for the defence of North America has not been, nor is likely in the future to be, produced or approved under the existing procedures.

(b) The Canada-United States Emergency Air Defence Plan (CANUSEADP 2-56) only ensures that operational procedures will be compatible in an emergency.

(c) While combined studies are prepared, detailed planning is conducted on a unilateral basis by both countries; thus, while the separate national air defence plans may be coordinated in their initial development, they are thereafter processed separately and at times changed without reference to the other country, even though one nation's plans are dependent on plans of the other nation. This at best results in poorly coordinated plans which are neither the most effective nor the most economical and which can result in the uncoordinated and hence wasteful provision of means.

21. If one agency were charged with the responsibility to produce plans for the employment of forces assigned, attached or otherwise made available, and to produce studies on the desirable air defence posture for Canada and the United States for the review and approval of both governments the following advantages would accrue:

(a) It would ensure that air defence of both countries would be considered as a single problem;

(b) It would ensure that plans were coordinated at all levels; and

(c) It would expedite approval of such plans and thereby facilitate consideration by government departments of the military operating requirements of one nation in the territory of another.

22. Because of the possibility of a sudden attack with little or no strategic warning, the air defence forces must be prepared to fight from the very beginning of hostilities with the weapons, facilities and command structure in being and deployed at the outset of war. There will not be time to organize, train, equip, or deploy additional forces to augment those on hand in time to meet the initial attack. Common procedures and practices must be effective from the outset. It is therefore necessary to have in existence in peacetime the organization which will be required in war.

23. It is, therefore, concluded that the best method of dealing with the air defence of Canada and the United States is to apply the NATO principle of unified command to North America by delegating to a single commander the authority to exercise operational control over all continental elements of the air defence forces made available for the air defence of both countries. An appropriate title for such a commander would be "Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence, Canada-United States" (CINCADCANUS). The advantages of having a single authority responsible for conducting the air defence of both countries are summarized as follows:

(a) A single chain of operational control would exist for the authoritative and timely employment of weapons and to effect immediate reinforcement between commanders, regardless of nationality.

(b) One authority would be responsible for ensuring that common operating procedures and directives were in use and that the deployment and use of the continental elements of the air defence forces was in accordance with a single plan for the defence of North America.

(c) The organization required for war would be in existence and exercised during peacetime.

24. Several basic considerations are involved in the integration of operational control of the air defence systems of the two countries. They concern:

(a) The mission of the command.

(b) The terms of reference of the Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence, Canada-United States (CINCADCANUS).

(c) The intergovernmental structure whereby decisions may be reached.

(d) The basic organization.

Throughout this paper guiding principles for establishment of CINCADCANUS have been considered and it will be necessary to prepare detailed plans for this organization based on these principles.

25. The mission of the commander should reflect the degree of the commander's responsibility. CINCADCANUS should therefore be given the mission of defending Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska against air attack.

26. Regardless of his nationality, CINCADCANUS should be made responsible to both the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff. His terms of reference should include the following:

(a) CINCADCANUS should exercise operational control over assigned and augmentation forces made available for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska. (CINCONAD is now charged by the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff with certain air defence activities in Greenland. If this responsibility is to be placed upon CINCADCANUS, he should be responsible solely to the U.S. authorities therefor.) Commanders making augmentation forces available may place restrictions on their deployment.

(b) CINCADCANUS should produce plans for the employment of forces assigned, attached or otherwise made available, and should produce studies on the desirable continental air defence posture, and submit them for approval to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff as appropriate.

(c) CINCADCANUS should specify the states of combat readiness. He should establish procedures and issue directives, within existing national policies, for the operation of the air defence forces assigned, attached or otherwise made available. He should cause the command to engage in training and practice exercises in order to ensure the readiness of forces and facilities and the appropriateness of the measures in effect.

(d) CINCADCANUS should ensure that provision is made for prompt initiation of wartime operations in an emergency.

(e) CINCADCANUS should be responsible for advising the responsible military authorities of both countries of the likelihood of air attack.

27. "Operational control", as used in this paper, is defined as the power of directing, coordinating and controlling the operational activities of deployed units which may, or may not, be under the command of the authority exercising operational control. Permanent changes of station, especially across national boundaries, would be contained in CINCADCANUS deployment plans and would require approval of higher authority in peacetime. Temporary reinforcements from one area to another, including crossing the international boundary to meet operational requirements, would be within the authority of commanders having operational control.

28. In consonance with the above mission and terms of reference, CINCADCANUS must be responsible to the military authorities of the governments of both nations. He must therefore have some means whereby he can secure approval of his plans, procedures, and directives; these should be formulated and approved in peacetime so that they may be rapidly implemented in an emergency.

(a) The Commander-in-Chief should formulate plans and procedures and submit them through the appropriate executive agencies concurrently to both the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff for approval.

(b) In peacetime, governmental approval of certain plans and procedures will fall at least in part outside the purview of the military authorities of the nations concerned. Such plans and procedures should be referred by both the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff to the appropriate agencies of their respective governments and be made the subject of inter-governmental coordination.

29. The organization of the air defence system must be considered in two regards: The first is the basic command organization and the second is the organization for operational control.

30. The basic command organization for the air defence forces of the two countries must take into consideration the differences inherent in two national military organizations and of the diverse logistic, training, and personnel requirements of air and ground forces of both nations. Command of forces of one nationality, which include the logistic, training, and personnel functions, should be exercised by national commanders responsible to their national authorities for these aspects of their command.

31. The Commander of each Service providing forces should be the principal advisor to CINCADCANUS in matters of his Service which pertain to ADCANUS. The relationship between such commanders within the air defence system should be, in general, similar to that presently existing within the U.S. Continental Air Defence Command. This procedure is based on principles established during World War II for joint and combined commands, and is that now used in NATO. It provides for the forces of each Service to be assigned to and commanded by a commander of the same Service although they are under the operational control of joint commanders.

32. The organization for operational control will differ from that of command. Since the organization for operational control is designed for the conduct of tactical operations, it must be organized to meet the threat and to employ the forces available in the most effective manner. The authority for operational control should be vested in the CINCADCANUS and may be exercised through subordinate geographical joint commands. The geographical organization of the command should take into consideration the following:

(a) The location of the principal targets.

(b) The avenues of approach of enemy attack.

(c) The existing and planned future facilities, organizational structure, and command boundaries.

(d) The existing and planned weapons systems and their capabilities.

(e) The existing and planned surveillance and control systems.

(f) The span of control.

(g) Defence in depth.

(h) The movement of reserve forces.

33. When considering the requirements for geographical boundaries, the international boundary should be used whenever operationally and technically feasible.

34. CINCADCANUS and his deputy should not normally be from the same nation. His staff should be a joint staff composed of officers of both nations.

35. The commander of any particular area should be selected according to the following principles:

(a) In those geographical areas lying wholly in one country and containing only forces of that country, the commander and staff should be from that country; and

(b) In those geographical areas including territory of both countries and/or forces of both countries, the commander and his deputy should normally not be from the same country. His staff should be a joint staff composed of officers of both nations.

All air defence forces located in one area should be under the operational control of the area commander.

Conclusions

36. In order to provide the most effective air defence of North America, the operational control (see paragraph 27 above) of the air defence forces of Canada and the United States should be integrated.

37. The air defence organization, forces, facilities, and procedures to be used in wartime should be established and exercised in peacetime.

38. In order to accomplish the above, operational control over all continental elements of the air defence forces made available for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska should be delegated to a single commander.

39. The Commander-in-Chief (CINCADCANUS) should be responsible to the Chiefs of Staff of both countries. His mission should be the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska. His terms of reference should include the matters stated in paragraph 26 above.

40. Command of forces of one nationality, which includes such matters as logistic support, administration, discipline, internal organization and unit training, should be exercised by national commanders responsible to their national authorities for these aspects of their commands.

41. Each commander providing forces should be the principal advisor to the CINCADCANUS on matters of his Service which pertain to ADCANUS.

42. The relationship between commanders within the air defence system should be, in general, similar to those presently existing within the U.S. Continental Air Defence Command.

43. The organization for operational control should be based on geographical subdivisions of the area to be defended and operational control should be exercised through commanders of geographical areas.

44. The geographical organization of the integrated command should be based on:

(a) The location of the principal targets.

(b) The avenues of approach of enemy attack.

(c) The existing and planned future facilities, organizational structure, and command boundaries.

(d) The existing and planned weapons systems and their capabilities.

(e) The existing and planned surveillance and control systems.

(f) The span of control.

(g) Defence in depth.

(h) The movement of reserve forces.

45. When considering the requirements for geographical boundaries, the international boundary should be used whenever operationally and technically feasible.

46. CINCADCANUS and his deputy should not normally be from the same nation. His staff should be a joint Staff composed of officers of both nations.

47. The commander of any particular area should be selected according to the following principles:

(a) In those geographical areas lying wholly in one country and containing only forces of that country, the commander and staff should be from that country; and

(b) In those geographical areas including territory of both countries and/or forces of both countries, the commander and his deputy should not normally be from the same country. His staff should be a joint staff composed of officers of both countries.

All air defence forces located in one area should be under the operational control of the area commander.

48. Plans prepared by the CINCADCANUS should be reviewed and approved by both the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff.

49. Plans and procedures outside the purview of the military Services should be referred by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff to the appropriate agencies of their respective governments and when appropriate be made the subject of inter-governmental coordination.

50. The plans and procedures to be used in wartime should be formulated and approved in peacetime and should be capable of rapid implementation in an emergency.

Recommendations

51. It is recommended that:

(a) The conclusions above be approved as the basic principles on which the integrated operational control of the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska be undertaken; and

(b) The Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff take action to secure the approval of both governments for the integration of the operational control of Canada and the United States air defences in accordance with the foregoing concepts.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

National Defence believes, and we agree, that it is not too early to sound out the USA authorities on their future intentions in this field i.e. after expiration of the six month period which will be covered by the initial exchange of notes. We are naturally anxious to be as completely informed as possible on this whole subject; of more immediate interest perhaps is the fact that USA ideas as to what more permanent arrangements might be desirable will have a bearing on the drafting of any statement which we might make here early this year. We would not wish our statement to be such as to cause embarrassment if say in six months the USA were to put up a good case for additional facilities.

2. The USA briefers who came to Ottawa in November informed us that in the initial stages there would only be two airfields on which squadrons would be armed with atomic weapons. They did not indicate which further squadrons would next be armed as more of these weapons became available, though they told us that other squadrons would be so armed. We do not wish to put ideas in the minds of USA authorities which are not there already, however we believe you should explore with the State Department such specific questions as the following:

(a) If the Air Defence Squadrons at Goose Bay and in Newfoundland are to be armed with these weapons eventually would not the question of storage on Canadian territory arise?

(b) If a USA aircraft armed with one of these weapons is forced to land at a Canadian airfield because of unserviceability of the aircraft how would the USA authorities expect to handle the problem of temporary storage of the weapons?

(c) What ideas have the USA authorities in mind concerning the amendments which will be necessary to the rules of interception and engagement to allow the use of atomic weapons in Canadian air space under conditions of red and yellow warning?

3. The draft USA note (your telegram 2314 of December 17) seems satisfactory in substance. Some drafting suggestions are included below. You might, as well, seek clarification on one point. Numbered paragraph 4 in the USA draft note would seem to differentiate between the procedures currently in effect in reporting (on a service to service basis) crashes of aircraft from either country in the territory of the other, and those which would be employed during the term of the proposed agreement in the event of a crash of a USA aircraft carrying atomic rockets. It is proposed in the latter case that "the Canadian government will be immediately informed". Is this the USA understanding of this para and is it intended, for example, to use the channel now established for clearance of overflights when atomic weapons are involved. i.e. the State-External channel?

4. Our drafting suggestions follow:

(a) Paragraph 1 of the preamble to be revised to read: "I have the honour to refer to conversations between representatives of our two governments regarding the proposed incorporation of nuclear weapons in the air defence of Canada, the continental USA and Alaska. Such a move would greatly enhance the joint defence capabilities which our two countries have been developing over a period of years".

(b) Numbered paragraph 1—the date January 1, 1957 will have to be changed to accord with the date on which our notes are exchanged.

(c) Same paragraph—insert a period after "July 1, 1957" and substitute for the remainder of the present first sentence a new sentence reading: "More permanent arrangements will have to be worked out to cover the period after July 1957".

(d) Same paragraph—make a new paragraph beginning with: "USAF planes so armed will enter Canadian air space, etc." and revise the second sentence to read: "In such an event the USA planes will confine their activities in the main to Canadian territory etc".

(e) Present numbered paragraph 6—omit first sentence.

5. The points raised in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your telegram 2319 of December 18 have been considered. We do not believe however that this particular exchange of notes would be the appropriate vehicles for clarification of the point at issue. We are concerned that there should be adequate consultation in the period leading up to the calling of an alert and we shall continue to seek our objective in this regard; the next step will be to send to you for transmission to the State Department our comments on Murphy's letter (your despatch 1748 of December 5[34]) The exchange of notes under consideration however is concerned with what will happen after an alert has been called, i.e. when it has been definitely established that a hostile aircraft has entered the air defence system. Procedures do exist for the issuance of air defence warning yellow or red. They may eventually require modification but we see this problem as distinct from that with which we are concerned in this proposed exchange of notes.

6. On the question of publicity we would find it difficult to draft with any precision a possible Canadian statement without having a look at what it is proposed should be released in Washington. We have a number of ideas in mind but which of these should be given priority in a statement would depend in some measure on what is said on the subject by the USA authorities. For this reason we would welcome receipt of the USA draft statement as soon as possible.

7. It should be borne in mind that there may be no press statement as such in Ottawa but that release of information on the subject may come by way of answers to questions which may be asked in the House. While we can attempt to foresee the kind of questions which might be asked we cannot rule out the possibility of having to answer questions which we had not contemplated. Questions may be asked for example about storage of the weapons in Canada and while we can appreciate the USA reasons for wishing to avoid public reference to the problem we may have to say something. We believe however it would be possible to omit reference to the storage question in any formal statement which we might prepare for release to the press.

8. You might let Nugent know as well that we would not believe it essential to underline the fact that there had been an exchange of notes on the subject and that we would avoid any direct reference to the exchange unless forced by questions in the House to do so. We had not given thought to drafting any background guidance paper. We would be interested in anything of this nature which the State Department might think it necessary to have in hand.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

This morning we met with Pentagon and State Department officials concerned with this question. Among those present were General Coiner and General Loper from the Pentagon, Parsons (Director, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs), Nugent (Officer in charge Canadian Affairs), Farley (Office of Atomic Energy Matters), and Unger (Office of European Regional Affairs) of the State Department; Air Commodore Cameron was also present.

2. We first endeavoured to explore what ideas the USA authorities had as to the more permanent arrangements, posing in turn the three questions contained in your paragraph 2. In reply to the first question it was made clear that other than the base in Northern Michigan, no additional squadrons which would affect Canada, would be equipped with the MB1 before July 1/57. By that time production will be sufficient to accelerate the introduction of the MB1 to other squadrons some of which would no doubt be in the northern part of the USA. We gather that priority for reequipment is not firm beyond the first four or five bases. The USAF have no plans to equip Goose Bay or Newfoundland bases with the MB1 for the next two years and thus the question of storage on Canadian territory would not arise before it would presumably be resolved in connection with giving the RCAF an MB1 capability. (Our own estimate) with regard to your question (b), it was conceded that in the event of an aircraft equipped with the MB1 having to make a forced landing in Canada, a problem of temporary custody would arise, but it would only be "very temporary". Under USAF procedures, a pilot having to make such a forced landing must remain with his aircraft, and as he would constantly be tracked by radar when in flight it would normally be possible to send quickly another aircraft to remove the weapon and return it to the USA base. The problem is thus not so much one of temporary storage as of custody until removed, and no storage facilities as such would be required. With regard to your question (c) concerning the rules of interception and engagement, we assume that you had not, before sending your telegram under reference, received from us the USA rules as amended in the light of introduction of the MB1. General Loper explained that it was their understanding that USA aircraft operating in Canadian air space do so under Canadian rules and Canadian aircraft operating in USA air space do so under American rules. The USAF assume that we would revise our rules as they have theirs. In addition to the rules of interception and engagement it was made known that there are CONAD standard operating procedures (SOP's) which spell out the circumstance when an MB1 armed aircraft will be ordered into the air. These SOP's presumably restrict the scrambling of an MB1 aircraft until identification either by RCAF or USAF aircraft equipped with conventional armament of an unknown as hostile is practically certain. We have been promised a copy of the relevant instructions.

3. We left with the Americans a copy of your drafting suggestions. Except for suggestion (c), these were all acceptable to them. With regard to suggestion (c), it was thought preferable to delete from the first sentence of numbered paragraph 1 the words "for six months from January 1/57" so that the first two sentences of this paragraph would read as follows: "The initial period during which the Canadian Government will authorize the carriage of MB1 weapons over Canada will extend to July 1/57. More permanent arrangements will have to be worked out to cover the period after July 57. USA air force planes so equipped ..."

4. We then took up the clarification you requested in numbered paragraph 4. It was explained to us that this paragraph had been worded in the way it stands in the draft to take care of a request made by General Foulkes during the last session in Ottawa that the Canadian Government should be notified immediately of any crash in Canadian territory of an aircraft carrying MB1 rockets. Although service authorities of both countries considered interservice arrangements entirely adequate, the USAF was anxious that because of the potential hazard involved, General Foulkes' request should be met. Already procedures have been worked out and are in effect whereby the air defence command will notify St. Hubert and St. Hubert will inform the Canadian Government through AFHQ, Ottawa. In parallel fashion and as promptly as possible, the Pentagon will notify the State Department which will inform the Canadian Embassy in Washington. Parsons thought that the USA Embassy in Ottawa would also have to be informed. In response to our question, we were assured that this procedure presented no difficulties. Farley pointed out that agreement to this procedure would not affect existing arrangements for handling SAC overflights which will stand.

5. We next took up the question of publicity making the points of your paragraphs 7 and 8. You will by now have received the draft press release (our telegram 3 January 2†). We were given to understand that this statement will be discussed at a meeting tomorrow of the operations coordination board and, if approved, would then go to the President. Once again it was confirmed to us that no statement would be released until the exchange of notes has been effected. Additionally, the Pentagon are preparing a question and answer paper, mainly to enable unit commanders to deal with any questions addressed to them from public sources. We will be given a copy of this paper when it is final. In the main it will restate the points contained in the press release, but enlarge on some where there might be misunderstanding. There is one question in the present draft of this paper concerning "deployment" of the MB1 outside the USA. The suggested answer is in vague terms and to the effect that the question is under study. We raised the question of your concern with regard to safety features, and the problem of storage. The questions and answers cover the problem of safety features, we were told, but there is no reference to the problem of storage (see paragraph 2 above). The USA representatives again made it clear that they only put in the last paragraph of their draft release on the assumption that we might wish such a statement to be included, and they will of course delete it if we so wish, or reserve it for dealing with questions which may be put to USA authorities.

6. Just before the meeting broke up, General Loper raised the question of future procedure once the exchange of notes has been effected, for continuing or more permanent arrangements after the six month period. It was for consideration whether this should be done in the forum of the PJBD, or whether some other arrangement should be made. Neither the State Department officials nor the two Pentagon representatives expressed any strong views one way or another. Nor did they have any firm ideas as to whether the more permanent arrangements to be made would be formalized by exchange of notes, PJBD recommendation, or by some other method. The State Department would be glad to have an expression of your views on this general point of future procedure.[35]

7. The State Department will send us as soon as possible a clear copy of the draft exchange of notes and any amendments which might be made to the draft press release and an up to date text of the questions and answers paper, all of which we will pass on to you. We would naturally appreciate your comments on these as soon as possible.

IV. INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF THE CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCES OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES IN PEACETIME (SECRET)

The Department of External Affairs responded to this point (in a telegram dealing primarily with the wording of a press release) in the following terms: "You might indicate to the State Department that we believe that future and more permanent arrangements with respect to this subject should be made through the diplomatic channel and ... set out in a further exchange of notes." appointed to study the integration of operational control of the continental air defences of Canada and the United States in peacetime.

(CSC:1855.1 TD:3 dated 10 Jan 57)

19. General Foulkes introduced this item and informed the Committee that these proposals were being considered by the Chiefs of Staff of both Canada and the United States and would have to be approved by the governments of both countries. He suggested that this matter not be placed before the Canadian Cabinet until the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the proposals.

20. The Chairman informed the Committee that the Minister of National Defence intended to mention this matter at the next meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee but that no specific submission would be made at that time.[36]

21. The Chairman considered that these proposals will bring the control and planning functions of the air defence of North America into line with similar functions exercised in other NATO commands. The proposals will have the advantage of placing Canada in a position to take a more active part in air defence planning and to have a greater control over planning at the staff level. He suggested that one of the major problems of concern to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had been in the field of requirements planning and that these proposals would go a long way towards making it possible to exercise greater control by the Chiefs of Staff in this field. He stated that a short paper was being prepared by the Joint Staff to include the Conclusions and Recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee's report for submission to CDC at a later date.

22. The Chief of the General Staff commented on the amount of detail which had been included in the report concerning the method by which operational control would be carried out. He suggested that perhaps the Ad Hoc Committee had exceeded its terms of reference in this regard.

23. The Chief of the Air Staff replied that the details of integrated control would be of considerable concern to Ministers and that they should be spelt out in order that there would be no misapprehension as to the actual meaning of the proposals. These proposals would enable a degree of restraint in joint air defence planning to be applied at the staff level before such plans are presented to Chiefs of Staff and the Canadian Government.

24. Vice Admiral DeWolf considered that it would be impossible to avoid extra pressure on the Chiefs of Staff to implement expensive air defence plans, but that such extra pressure must be accepted. In a command set-up of this type some requirements planning would be unavoidable.

25. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff considered that now was a suitable time to commence a long-range study to determine how much more should be invested in the air defence system. He was concerned with the growing magnitude of expense and the fact that some of the additional refinements may have diminishing returns.

26. The Committee agreed:

(a) to approve, in principle, the report of the Ad Hoc Committee for the integration of operational control of the continental air defences of Canada and the United States in peacetime;

(b) to direct the Joint Staff to prepare a brief paper for Cabinet Defence Committee which would include the Conclusions and Recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee's Report and which would be circulated to the Chiefs of Staff for their approval when completed.

III. BRIEFING ON AIR DEFENCE PROBLEMS BY THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF

7. The Chief of the Air Staff reviewed the threat posed by the U.S.S.R. to North America and emphasized the conclusion that the only safe way to assess Russia's potential was to assume that it could keep pace with the air offensive capabilities of the U.S. The R.C.A.F. was convinced that Russian aircraft were capable of attacking North American targets and could reach an altitude over them as high as 57,000 feet. Knowledge of Russian capabilities in the field of supersonic manned bombers and unmanned air-breathing missiles was uncertain but their capabilities had to be assessed in terms of U.S. capabilities. A new U.S. manned bomber known as the "HUSTLER" flew last summer at supersonic speeds. Near the target it could fly as fast as Mach 2 at a height of 60,000 feet. It seemed that the CF105 presently being developed would be able to cope with this threat and we should try to develop it successfully. An important feature of the "HUSTLER" was that it could carry an air-to-surface missile which could be released 150-200 miles from the target.

In the field of missiles, a project in the U.S. known as "NAVAHO" was proceeding. This weapon might have a range of over 5,000 miles, travelling at Mach 2.5 and carrying an atomic warhead in megaton range. Conceivably a similar weapon could be operational by the U.S.S.R. from about 1962 onwards. It was known that in Russia there had been regular firings of missiles with a range of up to 700 miles.

The developments in the aircraft and missile fields gave the offensive a significant advantage and set an extremely difficult defence task. However, the air defence potential was also being steadily improved and could be expected to provide a real hurdle against all possible threats except the intercontinental ballistic missile. Nevertheless, even against the ICBM, it appeared feasible that a warning system, which would give twenty minutes warning to American targets, could be provided. This was especially significant for the Strategic Air Command. Missiles armed with atomic warheads were showing considerable promise of increasing the effectiveness of the defence, including missiles launched from aircraft and from the ground. It would appear, therefore, that these would be logical and necessary weapons for Canada to adopt in the future.

8. Air Marshal Slemon said that, up to 1965, North America could be attacked by manned bombers flying at subsonic and supersonic speeds, carrying nuclear weapons; unmanned air-breathing intercontinental guided missiles, armed with nuclear warheads; guided missiles with ranges from 150 miles upwards armed with nuclear warheads, launched from submarines, surface ships and aircraft; and intercontinental ballistic missiles armed with nuclear warheads. In conjunction with these threats, electronic and mechanical countermeasures, including decoys, would likely be employed by the enemy. He believed that some of the long-range missiles, including the ICBM, would have sufficient accuracy to be effective against large area targets. However, an enemy would have to deliver an attack with great accuracy on a large number of smaller targets before he could effectively cripple the U.S.A.F. retaliatory force which, so long as it remained relatively intact, constituted the greatest deterrent to war. It was significant, therefore, that for several years after the introduction of the ICBM, the manned bomber would likely continue to be the most effective method of delivering an attack with the degree of accuracy required and would therefore remain a serious threat.

9. Air Marshal Slemon then referred to the proposals to increase the regular defence squadrons to 15 in number, deployed on 15 bases across Canada. He recalled that authority had been provided to implement the first phase of this expansion programme to a total of 12 squadrons on 12 bases. The whole plan had been predicated on an expansion northward of the existing ground environment, including an additional 26 prime radars and 123 gap fillers and related communications.

Because of financial and manpower limitations, it now seemed unlikely that the U.S. would proceed with plans for extending radar coverage in Canada. It was also doubtful, at this stage at any rate, that the U.S. would provide substantial assistance towards additional ground environment in this country. This had influenced the R.C.A.F. to hold off implementation of the base and squadron expansion programme which had been agreed. In other words, the R.C.A.F. had recommended, and the Minister had agreed, that they would not go ahead with the programme to expand 12 air defence squadrons deployed on 12 bases. This deferment took into account the fact that BOMARC missiles were nearing the operational stage and it was visualized that some of these weapons would be introduced into Eastern Canada within the next few years.

The U.S. had planned a line of BOMARC bases along their northern border from coast to coast and would like to have two such bases in the general vicinity of North Bay and Ottawa. This would contribute substantially to the defence of Canadian cities southward, whereas if located south of the border missiles would be engaging targets over the top of the Canadian industrial heartland. It was possible that the U.S. would be prepared to contribute to these installations, either by providing the missiles or by other cost sharing. Informal discussions would be held with the U.S. authorities to ascertain what they might be prepared to do should it be decided to include two BOMARC bases in the North Bay-Ottawa areas.

10. Air Marshal Slemon referred to the need for the introduction of automatic equipment for the control of the air defence system and reviewed briefly the progress the U.S.A.F. was making with the "SAGE" system. Joint Canada-U.S. studies indicated the necessity of automaticity in the area in Canada lying south of a line roughly from Lake Superior to Quebec City. The R.C.A.F. and the Defence Research Board were now studying a modification to SAGE known as CAGE, or combined semi-automatic ground environment. This would not use as many central computers or such expensive communications as SAGE and it therefore would be considerably cheaper. Provided the development was a successful one, proposals for its installation in the area described would be made later on.

11. The Committee noted the briefing of the Chief of the Air Staff on a number of air defence problems.

IV. IMPROVEMENT TO PRIME RADARS

12. The Minister of National Defence said that in the Pinetree system there were 37 prime radars in Canada, of which Canada financed 12 and the U.S. 25. Each station consisted of search and height finder radars capable of operating effectively up to an altitude of approximately 40,000 feet. Improvements were now necessary because hostile aircraft as well as our interceptors had improved their altitude performance beyond the capability of these radars. A joint Canada-U.S. plan had been devised to carry out these improvements in two stages. The first was to complete improvements in the system to give high coverage up to 75,000 feet by the autumn of 1960. This involved modifications to 10 of the 12 stations operated in Canada. The second stage would consist of the addition of one 100,000-foot radar at one of the remaining sites. The radar for this second stage had not yet been selected and authority to implement the second stage would be sought subsequently. The search and height finders for stage one were the best proven radars available and would fit into any foreseen plans to introduce automaticity into the system.

The U.S. had budgeted for the improvement of radars which they financed in Canada and it would be advantageous if both the U.S. and Canadian programmes could be implemented at the same time so that Canadian industry would be in a favourable position to compete for the production orders for the U.S.-financed radars, as well as those required by the R.C.A.F.

13. The Minister recommended, on the advice of the Chiefs of Staff, that 10 of the 12 stations in the Pinetree system which Canada financed be improved to provide 75,000 foot coverage at a cost of $20.8 million; $1 million to be spent in the fiscal year 1957-58; $9 million in 1958-59; $9.75 million in 1959-60; and $1.05 million in 1960-61.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, January 18th, 1957 — Document D2-57†).

14. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was no alternative but to proceed because the system would be ineffective unless it were so modified. Furthermore, the improvements had to take place at the same time as the Americans were modifying the radars for which they were responsible, otherwise there would be gaps in the line. The plan involved no additions in personnel, although there would be insignificant changes in manpower establishments.

(b) Europeans were coming to understand that the North American warning lines were one of the most significant factors in the deterrent to war. However, this increasing awareness provided European countries with a rationale to reduce their local defences. Warning systems in Europe were being steadily pushed ahead and it was possible to envisage radar coverage extending from Turkey to the north of the British Isles across North America and to Midway in the Pacific, providing warning to the Western world of a possible attack by the Soviet Union.

(c) It was argued that, with the intercontinental ballistic missile in sight, there was little point in improving radar coverage which could give no warning of an attack from that kind of threat. On the other hand, it would be many years before the ICBM would become the main offensive weapon exclusive of all others. U.S. and Canadian defence authorities were of the opinion that even after the advent of the ICBM, the threat would consist of a combination of missiles and manned aircraft. If there were no warning against attacks by manned bombers, the enemy would concentrate on that and defence against such a threat would be materially reduced.

15. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the necessity to improve radars in the Pinetree system and agreed to recommend that improvements be made in 10 of the 12 stations financed by Canada to provide, by 1960, high coverage up to 75,000 feet, at a total cost estimated to be $20.8 million, to be spread over the four fiscal years ending March 31st, 1961.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Defence Liaison (1) Division to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], February 13, 1957

AGENDA ITEM 6 — 605TH MEETING CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACE-TIME

The proposed submission to Cabinet Defence Committee on this subject is so condensed that it fails in some measure to give a complete picture of the problem. This is perhaps inevitable since the original paper done by the ad hoc group, although lengthy, was tightly argued. Since condensation is required, the document which goes to Cabinet Defence Committee should be carefully edited to keep possible misunderstanding to a minimum. Certain suggestions for revisions in the proposed memorandum are set out below with the object of making the submission more understandable.

(a) The submission should have appended to it the complete report of the ad hoc group so that Ministers, if they wish, could read the complete case for joint operational control. As the submission stands all the arguments of the ad hoc committee are summed up in the first phrase "in recognition of the need for close integration of Canadian-United States air defences ...".

(b) Would it not be better to state clearly that the Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence, Canada-United (CINCADCANUS) will be an American, and that the Deputy Commander-in-Chief will be a Canadian?

(c) Paragraphs 2 and 3 — A possibility of confusion exists in these two paragraphs. There is a real difference in the meaning of the military terminology "operational control" on the one hand and "under command" on the other. The argumentation in these two paragraphs is so condensed as to blur this distinction.

(d) Paragraph 4(e) — It would be wise to make clear the distinction between the "plans" which CINCADCANUS will be authorized to produce for the employment of forces assigned to him for operational purposes and the "studies on the desirable continental air defence posture" (paragraph 3 — Appendix "A") which he will also be authorized to undertake.[37] It is our understanding that these terms were carefully chosen to delineate the powers of the proposed Commander. The latter means long-range objectives which may be desirable in the eyes of the Commander, but which cannot be thought of as military plans until approved by Governments.

(e) Paragraph 7 — The purpose of the submission is to gain approval for the appointment of a single operational commander. There already exists an effective coordinated system for the air defence of Canada. Some further clarity might be introduced in this paragraph. The paragraph might also include a sentence indicating that the exact terms of reference of the single commander when drafted would be submitted to Cabinet Defence Committee for its approval at a later date. We understand that this in fact is what the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff intends to do. It might be wise, however, to say so in the memorandum. Our advance into this new state of affairs should be by controlled stages.

(f) Paragraph 6 of Annex "A" might be clarified. The use of the phrase "likelihood of air attack" is open to question. The responsibility for such advice clearly lies with the senior military advisers, i.e. the Chiefs of Staff. The RCAF understand this paragraph to mean only that CINCADCANUS would be responsible for advising the senior commanders on the basis of tactical information which might come to him as a result of his concern with the warning lines, e.g. ferret operations which might be conducted by the Soviet Air Forces. The paragraph as it stands is open to some misinterpretation, in that it may seem to assign greater responsibility to this subordinate commander than is, in fact, intended.

2. The text of the submission has been lifted in the main from the ad hoc group's report. It is a submission which deals entirely with the military operational requirement. Nowhere in it does it even reflect the political problems inherent in the control of Canadian forces in peace-time by an outsider. It can be argued that this aspect of the question will be dealt with by Ministers when they consider the submission. On the other hand officials cannot be blind to the political aspects of this question, and the original submission to Cabinet Defence Committee should reflect some political awareness. Even a single sentence along the following lines might be enough: the United States authorities should be reminded that Canadian willingness to agree to joint operational control of the continental air defence forces should be met by a corresponding United States recognition of the need for adequate consultation with Canadian authorities on matters which might lead to the alerting of the air defence system.

? [R.M. Macdonnell]

3. This Department has constantly stressed the necessity for close United States consultation with the Canadian Government prior to the taking of decisions which might involve us and the rest of the world in hostilities. Canadian consent to enter into an agreement with the United States to set up a single operational commander should certainly provide us with an opportunity once again to impress upon the United States Government Canada's special place among the many countries allied to the United States. It is difficult to conceive of the United States taking any overt action to protect itself which would not immediately affect Canada. It is possible to conceive of action taken by the United States which would not, for example, involve her allies in the Rio Pact or the SEATO Pact. Geography and our willingness to cooperate effectively in joint continental defence efforts give us a special right to demand closer consultation. We should not lose any opportunity to re-assert this right and especially an opportunity such as this when the Canadian Government is called on to take a decision without precedent in Canadian history, namely the granting in peace-time of control to a foreign representative over our security forces.[38] If there is merit in these arguments, it would seem wise that their substance be reflected in this submission to Cabinet Defence Committee. It would be particularly apt to say something along these lines at this moment since we are in the process of negotiations with the United States authorities on alerts procedures.

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACETIME

In recognition of the need for close integration of Canadian and United States air defence, a study on the control of North American air defence forces has been undertaken by the Military Study Group at the direction of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. (The conclusions and recommendations of the Military Study Group are attached as Appendix B.†) This study has concluded that the operational control of Canadian and United States air defence forces should be delegated to a single commander who would be responsible to the Chiefs of Staff of both countries. Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence, Canada-United States has been suggested as a title for this commander.

2. The term "Operational Control" is defined as the power of directing, coordinating and controlling the operational activities of deployed units which may, or may not, be under the command of the authority exercising operational control.[39]

3. This principle of a single commander[40] in collective security arrangements is well established in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation where, for example, the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic have operational control over all assigned forces.

4. The establishment of an integrated operational control system for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska under a single commander, would be based on the following principles:

(a) national commanders would be responsible to their national authorities for logistics, administration, discipline, internal organization and unit training for their commands and would be the principal advisers to the Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Command in air defence matters of their services;

(b) operational control areas should be on a geographical basis (using international boundaries whenever feasible) and should be commanded by officers selected as follows:

(i) in areas lying wholly in one country and containing only forces of that country, the area commander and staff should be from that country and,

(ii) in areas which include territory of both countries and/or forces of both countries the area commander and his deputy should not normally be from the same country and the staff should be composed of officers from both countries.

(c) The Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Command and his deputy should not normally be from the same nation and should have a staff of officers from both nations;

(d) plans and procedures to be used in wartime should be formulated and approved in peacetime and should be capable of rapid implementation in an emergency;

(e) plans prepared by the Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Command should be reviewed and approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries and, where these plans are outside the purview of the military services, they should be forwarded through the Chiefs of Staff to respective governmental agencies for coordination and approval.[41]

5. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have approved these proposals.

6. The terms of reference for the Commander-in-Chief Air Defence Command would include the points set out in Appendix "A".

7. The Chiefs of Staff recommend, and I concur, that approval, in principle, be given for the establishment of an integrated operational control system[42] for the air defence of

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACETIME

Points to be Included in the Proposed Terms of Reference Commander-in-Chief, Air Defence, Canada-United States

1. The Commander-in-Chief shall be responsible to both the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska.

2. The Commander-in-Chief shall exercise operational control over assigned and augmentation forces made available for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska. Commanders making augmentation forces available may place restrictions on their deployment.

3. The Commander-in-Chief shall produce plans for the employment of forces assigned, attached, or otherwise made available, and shall produce studies on the desirable continental air defence posture, and submit them for approval to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff as appropriate.

4. The Commander-in-Chief shall specify the states of combat readiness. He shall establish procedures and issue directives, within existing national policies, for the operation of air defence forces assigned, attached, or otherwise made available. He shall cause the command to engage in training and practice exercises in order to ensure the readiness of forces and facilities and the appropriateness of the measures in effect.

5. The Commander-in-Chief shall assure that provision is made for prompt initiation of wartime operations in an emergency.

6. The Commander-in-Chief shall be responsible for advising the responsible military authorities of both countries of the likelihood of air attack.[44]

[43] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
(1) What is being asked for it seems to me is approval in principle for a single operational commander. We already have (or are said to have) an effective coordinated system. Some further clarity might be introduced.
(2) It seems to me that Cabinet Defence Committee should be given another opportunity to pass on the exact terms of reference of the single commander. I believe this is in fact the intention of the C.C.O.S. It might be wise to say so in this memo. If we are to become serfs then progress to that state should perhaps be by controlled stages! [J.J. VI. INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACETIME (SECRET)

19. The Committee had for consideration a draft brief for Cabinet Defence Committee, together with a proposed amendment† by the Chief of the Air Staff.

(CSC:1855.1 TD:3 of 8 Feb 57)

20. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff briefly reviewed the background of this paper and stated that now that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the proposals in principle, he would like to place them before CDC at an early date.

21. The Committee considered an amendment to the paper proposed by the Chief of the Air Staff which had been circulated to the members.

22. General Foulkes considered that this amendment laid too much stress on the need for integration to fight the air battle and insufficient stress on the importance for integrated planning in peacetime.

23. Air Marshal Slemon explained the reasons for his proposed amendment and emphasized the vital importance of setting up an organization by which very rapid decisions could be taken by Air Defence Commanders in war. This was of particular importance in contiguous sectors of control along the Canada-U.S. border. He pointed out that in order to function effectively in war it was essential to exercise control operations in peacetime.

24. The Chief of the Air Staff then suggested a further additional paragraph which laid particular emphasis on the necessity for joint coordinated planning.

25. Mr. Macdonnell stated that the Department of External Affairs was in general agreement with the principles outlined in the paper, but suggested that an additional paragraph should be inserted to read as follows: "The United States authorities should be reminded that Canadian willingness to agree to joint operational control of the continental air defence forces should be met by a corresponding United States recognition of the need for adequate consultation with the Canadian authorities on matters which might lead to the alerting of the air defence system".

26. After further discussion the Committee agreed:
(a) to include the amendment proposed by Mr. Macdonnell as a new paragraph 6;
(b) to delete the last sentence of paragraph 1;
(c) to attach the report of the Ad Hoc Committee in its entirety as Appendix "C";
(d) to approve the paper as amended for submission to Cabinet Defence Committee.

CONTINENTAL DEFENCE

Mr. Dulles signed the USA note last night and the formal exchange took place this morning.

2. The text of the USA note which is dated February 19 reads as follows:

"Excellency:

I have the honor to refer to conversations between representatives of our two governments regarding the proposed incorporation of nuclear weapons in the air defence of Canada, the Continental USA and Alaska. Such a move would greatly enhance the joint-defense capabilities which our two countries have been developing over a period of years.

As has already been indicated to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee, the initial nuclear capability visualized for air defence is in the form of an air-to-air rocket (MB-1). This weapon was issued around January 1, to the USA Air Force in small numbers for use in air defence activities. In order that this new weapon may be given maximum scope in defence activities which affect both Canada and the USA, this government wishes to propose that the MB-1 be carried by USA military aircraft over Canada under the following terms and conditions:

(1) The initial period during which the Canadian government will authorize the carriage of MB-1 weapons over Canada will extend to July 1, 1957. More permanent arrangements will have to be worked out to cover the period after July 1957.

(2) USA Air Force planes so armed will enter Canadian air space only in the event an air defense warning yellow or red is declared. In such an event, the USA planes will confine their activities in the main to Canadian territory bordering on the Great Lakes and extending northward to about 50 degrees north latitude. USA planes armed with MB-1 weapons, under air defense warning yellow or red, will be authorized by the Canadian government to land at, or take off from, Canadian bases in the territory over which they have authority to operate.

(3) In the circumstances visualized above, rules of interception and engagement over Canadian territory shall continue to be those established from time to time by the Canadian government for interceptor aircraft of the Royal Canadian Air Force operating over Canada. Attached for your info is a copy of the USA interception and engagement instructions and procedures, which have been reviewed for their applicability to the employment of atomic weapons and which became applicable on January 1, 1957.†

(4) The USA government has taken the utmost precaution in designing the weapon, and will exercise equal precaution in establishing operational procedures, to insure a minimum possibility of public hazard when employment of the MB-1 is necessary. Representatives of the Royal Canadian Air Force have been thoroughly informed by the USA Air Force concerning safety features.

(5) In accordance with current agreed procedures, crashes of aircraft from either country in the territory of the other are reported on a service-to-service basis. During the term of this agreement, the USA will take measures to insure that the Canadian government is immediately notified or any crash in Canadian territory of a USA aircraft carrying MB-1 rockets.

(6) Detailed arrangements will be made between the USA Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force to provide designated RCAF personnel with training necessary for the salvage of MG-1 weapons following an accident. In the event salvage is necessary, the USA air force is willing to send at any time, upon request, trained personnel to assist in the operation.

(7) Any info released jointly or separately by the two governments concerning this subject will be processed in accordance with the current understanding of March 19, 1951, which governs the release of publicity relating to joint Canadian-USA defense plans and operations.

If these conditions are acceptable to your government, I suggest that this note and your reply shall constitute an agreement effective from the date of your reply.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration. John Foster Dulles"

3. Our reply which bears the No. 91 and is also dated February 19 reads as follows:

"Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note of February 19, 1957, proposing that under certain terms and conditions the MB-1 air-to-air rocket may be carried by USA military aircraft over Canadian territory.

The terms and conditions set out in your note under reference are acceptable to my government which concurs as well with your suggestion that your note and this reply shall constitute an agreement effective the date of this note, and to extend to July 1, 1957.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration. A.D.P. Heeney"

4. Both notes are classified secret.

Note du ministre de la Défense nationale pour le Comité du Cabinet sur la défense

Memorandum from Minister of National Defence to Cabinet Defence Committee

INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACETIME

1. In recognition of the need for close integration of Canadian and United States air defence, a study on the control of North American air defence forces has been undertaken by the Military Study Group at the direction of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee and the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff. (The conclusions and recommendations of the Military Study Group are attached as Appendix "B",† and the report of the ad hoc committee is attached as Appendix "C").[45] This study has concluded that the operational control of Canadian and United States air defence forces should be completely integrated and under a United States Commander, with a Canadian Deputy, who would be responsible to the Chiefs of Staff of both countries.

2. This principle of operational control in collective security arrangements is well established in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization where, for example, the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic have operational control over all assigned national forces.

3. The establishment of an integrated operational control system for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska would be based on the following:

(a) The Commander's responsibilities will be as follows:

(i) In Peacetime. The development of plans and procedures to be used in war. These plans and procedures to be agreed to in peacetime and be ready for immediate use in an emergency. They will be reviewed, amended or approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries and Government approval will be sought before any plans are implemented. He will be responsible for the general pattern of training and the general supervision of practice exercises in order to ensure the readiness of the forces and facilities in time of emergency.

(ii) In War. In time of war he will be responsible for the direction of air operations of the Air Defence Command in accordance with the plans which have been agreed to in peacetime.

(b) The Canadian and United States commanders will continue to be responsible, in both peace and war, for logistics, administration, discipline, internal organization and unit training of their respective national commands.

4. It is considered that there are several advantages to Canada in accepting this form of integration:

(a) This procedure leaves with the Canadian Commander complete command and administration over Canadian troops and equipment.

[45] Voir/See Document 41.

(b) Affords the Canadian authorities early and continuing opportunities to influence and participate in the formulation of joint air defence policy.

(c) Provides early opportunity for joint examination of intelligence and circumstances which may lead the United States authorities to call an alert.

(d) Will provide a further channel for closer cooperation with the United States Air Force in the field of development and production of common techniques and equipment, and thus avoid unnecessary duplication.

(e) Will remove recurring United States criticism that Canada is not cooperating to the fullest extent in the Joint Air Defence of North America.

(f) Will provide an adequate basis for reaching a high standard of readiness and the least possible delay in passing from a peacetime to wartime footing.

(g) Will bring the Air Defence Command in North America in line with the other Commands in NATO.

5. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff have approved these proposals.

6. The United States authorities will be reminded that Canadian participation in joint operational control of the continental air defence forces should be met by a corresponding United States recognition of the need for adequate consultation with Canadian authorities on matters which might lead to the alerting of the air defence system.

7. The terms of reference for the Commander, Air Defence Command, would include the points set out in Appendix "A".[46]

8. The Chiefs of Staff recommend, and I concur, that approval in principle be given for the establishment of an integrated operational control system for the air defence of Canada, the Continental United States and Alaska under a single commander, based on the provisions set out above.[47]

114TH MEETING OF THE CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE TO BE HELD ON JUNE 13, 1957[48]

ITEM I — INTEGRATION OF OPERATIONAL CONTROL OF CANADIAN AND CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES AIR DEFENCE FORCES IN PEACETIME

The attached brief[49] on this subject, prepared by the Department of National Defence, is concerned with a decision of great national importance for which there is no precedent in recent Canadian history, namely, a decision to grant in peacetime, to a foreign representative, operational control of an element of Canadian security forces in Canada. There is a precedent in the NATO structure for the operational control of Canadian units by non-Canadian commanders, but this, of course, does not apply to forces within the national boundaries. While this Department has had an opportunity on several occasions to comment on the recommendations of the Military Study Group which are enclosed with the attached memorandum, it was not consulted on the drafting of the memorandum to the Cabinet Defence Committee.

2. "Operational control", in the context of this paper, is defined as "the power of directing, coordinating and controlling the operational activities of deployment units which may or may not be under the command of the authority exercising operational control". (A more detailed definition is contained in paragraph 27 of the Military Study Group's report.) In effect, national commanders would continue to be responsible for logistics, administration, discipline, internal organization and unit training of their respective national commands. The proposed commander of the joint forces (who would be an American) would, in wartime, direct the operation of units from Canada and the United States. In peacetime he would recommend plans and procedures for the operation of the joint forces in wartime and he would be responsible for the general supervision of practice exercises, in order to ensure the readiness of the forces and facilities in time of emergency.

3. The main interest of this Department in this subject centers on paragraph 6 of the attached submission. We have constantly stressed the necessity for close United States consultation with the Canadian Government prior to the taking of decisions which might involve us in hostilities. It is difficult to conceive that the United States could take any overt action to protect itself which would not immediately affect Canada. (It is possible to conceive of action taken by the United States which would not, for example, involve her allies in the Rio Pact.) Geography and our willingness to cooperate effectively in joint continental defence efforts, give us a special right to demand that United States consultation with Canada be adequate at all times. Canadian consent to enter into an agreement with the United States to set up a single operational commander of air defence forces should certainly provide us with an opportunity, which should not be lost, to reassert the need for close consultation and to impress upon the United States Government Canada's special place among the countries allied to the United States. It should be borne in mind that we are, at the moment, in the process of negotiations with the United States authorities on alerts procedures.

4. Two other comments concerning the drafting of the attached submission occur to officials in this Department. With respect to paragraph 4(e) of the submission, we are not aware that there has been "recurring United States criticism" of any Canadian shortcomings in the development of the joint air defences of North America. Conversely, there have been a variety of statements by the most senior members of the United States Government praising, both qualitatively and quantitatively, the Canadian contribution to the continental air defence system.

5. Finally, we believe that paragraph 8 of the submission might include a sentence indicating that the exact terms of reference of the proposed single command, when drafted, would be submitted to the Cabinet Defence Committee for its approval. Any move into this new stage of continental cooperation in defence matters should be by carefully controlled stages.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MR NORMAN

Please deliver the following note to the State Department: Begins. I am instructed by my Government to bring to the attention of the USA Government the allegations of disloyalty which have been made in the USA against Mr. E.H. Norman, the Canadian Ambassador to Egypt, a high and trusted representative of the Canadian Government. The irresponsible allegations to which I refer, and which in any event would concern matters to be dealt with by the Canadian Government and not by a Subcommittee of the USA Senate, were contained in the textual record of the Internal Security Subcommittee, of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, which was officially released by that body to the press in Washington at 4.30 p.m. on March 14.

I am instructed to protest in the strongest terms the action taken by an official body of the legislative branch of the USA Government in making and publishing allegations about a Canadian official. This procedure is both surprising and disturbing because it was done without the USA Government consulting or even informing the Canadian Government and without taking account of relevant public statements made earlier by the Canadian Government.

The Canadian Government examined similar allegations as long ago as 1951, and as the result of an exhaustive security enquiry the full confidence of the Canadian Government in Mr. Norman's loyalty and integrity has been confirmed in all respects. The conclusions of the Canadian Government were made public at that time and must have been known to the Subcommittee particularly as the State Department was requested at the time and again on December 11, 1952 to draw them to their attention. I am attaching the texts of two statements made by the Canadian Government on this matter in 1951.[52]

The repetition of such irresponsible allegations in the Subcommittee and the publication on the authority of this official body of a record containing such allegations is the kind of action which is inconsistent with the long standing and friendly cooperation characterizing relations between our two countries. Text of note ends.

2. I understand that you will deliver the above text to the State Department at 5 p.m. this afternoon. The Minister wishes to make this text public in the House tomorrow around

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MR. NORMAN

I presented the Note at 5 p.m. this afternoon to Burke Elbrick, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. In doing so, I explained that I would wish my representations regarded as though they had been made to the Secretary of State himself.

2. The text which I gave to Elbrick was that contained in your telegram with the following changes which had been agreed to by Crean:

(a) In the next to last paragraph the words "and of the exchange which took place in the House of Commons of Canada on this subject on March 14, 1957"[54] were deleted, and in the earlier part of that sentence the word "the" was omitted before "two" and the words "on this matter" were inserted before "in 1951".

(b) The press release of August 24, 1951, was replaced by the statement made by you in your press conference on August 16, 1951, beginning with the words "immediately on receipt" and ending with "fair and effective".[55]

3. I emphasized orally to Elbrick how seriously this matter was regarded by the Canadian Government. I also indicated that it was your intention to make our Note public in the House of Commons tomorrow at 3 p.m.

4. Elbrick fully appreciated our concern and the depth of our feeling. He knew we realized how difficult it was to affect the behaviour of committees of the Legislative Branch. At the same time, he thought it had to be recognized in the U.S. that the conduct of foreign relations was the responsibility of the Executive. He was confident that the Administration would be anxious one way or another to impress on the Committee the dangers in the course which they were apparently following. He was not sure how far the activities of this particular Sub-Committee would go, although he appeared somewhat disturbed at the indications that Emmerson had been called to appear again before it this Thursday. Clearly the State Department is troubled by the effect which all of this may have on their own position as well as on officials of other Governments whose names might be mentioned during such hearings.

5. Elbrick said that the State Department would of course be replying to your Note after it had received the serious attention which it merited. There was not a hope, however, that such a reply could be given to us tomorrow. They naturally could not object to your plan to release our Note tomorrow afternoon.

6. In talking with Elbrick, I recalled a visit which I had made to Washington in connection with the earlier episode when I was Under-Secretary. At that time I had seen "Doc" Matthews, who was then Deputy Under Secretary, in order to assure him personally that we were completely satisfied about Norman's loyalty and integrity and to secure an assurance from Matthews that the State Department and its representatives abroad would continue to show the same confidence in Norman as in other accredited representatives of the Canadian Government. Matthews had given me such an assurance at that time and I would expect it to continue to apply to Norman in present circumstances.

7. Finally I drew Elbrick's attention to your exchange in the House of Commons on March 15, 1957, and gave him extra copies to supplement those already received from this Embassy and from Merchant in Ottawa.

REFS TO E.H. NORMAN IN HEARINGS OF THE SENATE INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE

Despite the efforts which have been made by the State Department, the publication yesterday, on the basis of the Sub-Committee's decision, of further testimony taken in closed session in the hearings on the case of John Emmerson on March 21 clearly indicates that the Sub-Committee remains in full control of its own extraordinary procedures, and is unlikely to drop this case or to acknowledge in any way that its methods are at fault.

2. In reviewing the unhappy history of this matter, it will be clear that our recent protests to the State Department, modelled on similar action taken in 1951, while given a receptive and sympathetic hearing by the State Department have had little or no effect on members of the Sub-Committee and their supporting counsel.

3. There would seem to be only two possible courses. One, to leave matters where they now stand, on the basis of your public statement in the House on this case (March 15, 1957) and the earlier public statements of 1951. To this latest statement of the position of the Canadian Government may be added the public statement issued by the State Department on March 16 to the effect that "allegations which may have been made regarding Mr. Norman in the course of the hearings do not represent opinions of the USA Government, and that the USA maintains the friendliest relations with Canada, and has every confidence in the Canadian Government's judgement in the selection of its official representatives."[56]

4. It is to be expected that our formal note of March 18 to the State Department will receive a reply in due course, and presumably the question whether this exchange should be made public will be given careful consideration. We would hope the State Department reply would cover Morris' statements (March 21) concerning the State Department, made public yesterday and referred to in our telegram under reference. You will presumably wish to examine the transcript carefully.

5. The alternative course would be to restate the position taken in the memo of August 14, 1951, left with the State Department, as to the procedure we would wish followed in this and any similar cases which might arise. You will recall that that communication contained the following paragraphs.

"....If in evidence before investigating committees in Washington names of Canadian officials appear, the Canadian Government naturally expects that these names can be sent in confidence to the Canadian Government so that the allegations made can be investigated here and the results referred back to the State Department.

"The Canadian Government hopes that the State Department will agree that this is the course which should have been followed in this case, and will be able to give some assurance that it will be followed in the future."

6. You will note that in the hearings of March 21 made public yesterday, reference is again made by Morris, the Subcommittee counsel, to a "security memo" said to be in the possession of the Subcommittee, on the Norman case, and Morris has said "I understand that the State Department has now asked the FBI for this particular info, and apparently the FBI info that they have given them does confirm the security report that we put in the record."[57] In the second course described, we might presumably communicate to the State Department a request that any alleged security documents bearing on this case which have not hitherto been transmitted through appropriate channels to the Canadian authorities should be so communicated at once, for examination by the competent Canadian authorities as part of our own evaluation.

7. Of these two possible courses, we consider that in the light of our own firm determination in this case, and in view of the record of the Subcommittee, the second would lead only to the production of additional so-called "evidence" whenever the Committee saw fit for its own reasons to do so. We are inclined to think that this would not have the effect of stopping the renewed publication of these charges, and further it might well lead us into an unproductive exchange with the Subcommittee through the State Department on the evaluation of individual items of alleged "evidence".

8. This leaves us then with the first course, and although here too the possibility of further publicity must be expected, we will at least be resting our case on the firm public statements and official protests that have already been made in this matter. In this event there is some prospect that the responsible newspapers would not pay undue attention to the further proceedings of the Subcommittee in this case. (On the publication of yesterday's record, the Washington Post carried no reference today, and the New York Times only a brief and innocuous item from the UP). This does not, of course, mean that we should not continue and intensify our efforts with the State Department and the Administration to encourage them to renew their efforts to put these matters on a more rational and orderly basis, although we need not be too optimistic of the effects of our representations.

DEATH OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO EGYPT;[58]
SUGGESTION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS TO FLY PEACE TOWER FLAG AT HALF-MAST

26. The Minister of Public Works said it would be undesirable to follow the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition to fly the Peace Tower flag at half-mast for the Canadian Ambassador to Egypt, who had died in Cairo. This would establish an undesirable precedent, since it had never been done for any civil servant, nor any member of the Armed Services, even in war, but only for Members of Parliament and Senators. If it were once started for others it would become extremely difficult to determine where the line should be drawn.

27. The Cabinet, on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, agreed that the flag on the Peace Tower should not be flown at half-mast because of the death in Cairo of Mr. Herbert Norman, Canadian Ambassador to Egypt, despite the suggestion to that effect in Parliament by the Leader of the Opposition, because once exceptions were made to the present practice there would be no way of deciding when the flag should be flown at half-mast.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MR. NORMAN — SENATOR WATKINS STATEMENT

Your attention is drawn to AP despatch datelined Washington, April 5, in today's New York Times, which quotes Senator Watkins (Rep. Utah), Chairman of Senate Internal Sub-Committee, as having said that the publication of the Sub-Committee's first report (hearings of March 13) released on March 14, (see our telegram 602 of March 14) had been agreed to by him with "serious misgivings". According to this press report, Senator Watkins said "his reluctance was overcome to a large extent by the fact" that the State Department had cleared the first of these two records for publication. The report goes on: "Mr. Watkins said he had signed an approval for the release, along with other Subcommittee members, only after he had called the State Department and confirmed statements by the Subcommittee staff that the records had been cleared by the department." Later, Mr. Watkins said "I have been advised that only the security officers of the State Department had passed on the approval, and it was only after the review of the record in light of the protest from the Canadian Government that it was realized that the diplomatic section of the department should also have passed on the matter." Since the Subcommittee had already released the first hearing record, Mr. Watkins explained, "I felt it was only just to the witness and to Dr. Norman that the second hearing record should be also made public, because on the whole, the testimony at the second hearing was very favorable to the witness and to Dr. Norman." Mr. Watkins said that he had learned the release of the second hearing record was objected to by the Canadian Government but that "this fact was unknown to me" when he gave his approval.

Distressed by the renewed allegations that he had been a Communist agent, Norman committed suicide in Cairo on April 4, 1957.

2. We shall try to obtain the full text of this statement of Senator Watkins as promptly as possible.

3. According to the same press despatch, the State Department explained "that it was a case of an Acting Security Chief acting without authority and without consulting higher officials." Morris, questioned about the Watkins' statement is reported as having said that the testimony was cleared by Robert Cartwright, Acting State Department Security Chief, in the absence of Scott McLeod. "We deal only with the security people" Mr. Morris said. "They represent, Mr. Morris added, the State Department as far as we are concerned."

4. As you are aware, the various senior State Department officials with whom we have taken up this case from time to time have continually emphasized the fact that the Executive Branch could not control the actions of the Subcommittee. As the State Department press release of March 16 points out "the investigation being undertaken by the committee lies entirely within the control of the committee".

5. It seems to me clear that in the light of the AP report referred to above, we must address ourselves at once to the State Department to obtain a full explanation of the procedure which was followed in this case, and of the role reported to have been played by the Security Section of the State Department in the authorization of the release of the record on March 14, together with an indication of any part this section might have played in the subsequent release of March 28 of the hearings held on March 21. At the same time, we should press for a reply to our note of protest communicated to the State Department following the publication of the first report. This is necessary in any event. But the need for a reply is increased by the fact that according to Reuters press despatch from Tokyo of April 5, a "formal United States reply to a Japanese Government protest had been received by the Foreign Office through the Japanese Ambassador in Washington which expressed regret that the Japanese Professor Shigeto Tsuru (visiting in the U.S.) had been called before the Senate Investigation Committee". Finally, I believe we should take up as a matter of urgency, with the State Department the question of future procedure in similar cases and insist again (as we did in 1952) on the need for agreed and orderly procedures for handling any future cases of this kind which may arise. While the tragedy in the Norman case cannot be undone, it may be that with firmness on our part the individuals involved in investigations affecting foreign nationals and officials can be brought to a sense of responsibility. It would, I think, be clearly in the interest of future U.S.-Canadian relations to continue to make the points we had taken up with the State Department before this tragedy occurred.

6. I spoke to Elbrick of the State Department, this morning on the lines of the three points mentioned above. He at once confirmed that the State Department Acting Security Officer had acted on his own initiative and without any other authorization from the State Department. I told him that I wished to discuss these matters with him on Monday April 8. If there are any additional points you wish me to take up at that time, I should be glad to receive them before 10 a.m. on Monday. In the light of our conversation you may wish to consider incorporating these points in a formal communication to the State Department.

7. The only other development which has come to our notice is that Senator Neuberger (Dem.-Oregon) has publicly urged that a bi-partisan group of Senators investigate the Sub-committee's actions because of the "serious implications for our foreign relations".

CASE OF E.H. NORMAN

I called this morning on Elbrick, (with Lister present) to raise the three points mentioned in paragraph 5 of my telegram under reference. I emphasized again at the outset the depth and seriousness of the concern which this case had aroused in Canada, and said that it had been our hope after the developments of 1951 and 1952 that our two governments had been of one mind on the impropriety of the publication on the basis of such investigations of the names of Canadian officials. I stressed the point in our Memorandum of August 14, 1951, that if, in evidence before investigating committees in Washington, names of Canadian officials appear, the Canadian Government expects that these names can be sent in confidence to the Canadian Government, so that the allegations can be investigated by the responsible Canadian authorities, and the results referred back to the State Department.

2. It was necessary, therefore, for us to follow up our formal protest of March 18, to which no reply had yet been received, and to obtain from the State Department a full explanation of the procedure followed in this case, and of the role reported to have been played by a security officer of the State Department in allegedly authorizing the release of the record on March 14. Finally, I said that we would wish to initiate discussions with the State Department whereby an orderly and agreed procedure would be substituted for the handling of future cases should they arise.

3. The State Department has not yet completed its enquiries, and Elbrick was not able today to give us a full account of the communications which have passed between the State Department and the Sub-Committee, or to indicate with precision the degree of responsibility of the State Department security officer who agreed to the release. We were told that this particular officer, as is customary, was present with Emmerson at the hearings, and it would appear that he did in fact either acquiesce in, or give his concurrence to, the release of at least part of the record, although we gathered that a full report on this aspect is not yet completed. Elbrick made it clear that the State Department at the highest levels was strongly opposed to this kind of action on the part of the officer concerned, and agreed with our view that a full report is required. The Assistant Secretary in charge of Congressional Relations was in direct touch with Morris today and the Senators concerned, and we would be informed of the results of the enquiry as promptly as possible. Elbrick was at pains to assure us that the policy of the Executive Branch and of the State Department had not changed in any sense, and every effort would be made to guard against any similar occurrences in the future. He said that the Secretary himself had been deeply distressed by the recent developments and that both the Under-Secretary and Mr. Murphy had been in frequent touch with the Sub-Committee.

4. Following the receipt of the Canadian protest on March 18, the State Department had communicated with Senator Eastland, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee, both in writing and orally, to urge that further publication in the Norman case would seriously jeopardize our relations. Senator Eastland had replied on March 22, reiterating the Sub-Committee's right to maintain a public record in internal security investigations, and rejecting the suggestion that references to Canadian or other foreign officials should be deleted. The argument was to the effect that there was an obligation on the Sub-Committee to present to the Senate the whole picture, and that the presentation of a partial picture would be unfair to Emmerson and to Norman and to the objectives of the Sub-Committee. We requested, and hope to obtain, an accurate summary of Senator Eastland's reply. Both before and after the receipt of this reply, the State Department at senior levels took up this matter directly with the Sub-Committee, but to no avail, as was evidenced by the release of the report on March 28 of the hearings on March 21.

5. Elbrick did not deny that this case had been badly handled internally, and that a full investigation was needed to establish the role of the security officer concerned in giving clearance for the release of this testimony.

6. With reference to our protest of March 18, he said that a reply would be forthcoming shortly and after these current investigations are completed. He also agreed that every effort should be made to establish an agreed procedure for the handling of similar cases in the future, despite the obstructionist attitude taken to date by certain members of the Internal Security Sub-Committee.

7. At the conclusion of our meeting, we agreed that the following reply† might be made to any press enquiries.

My immediately following telegram contains draft instructions and the draft text of a proposed letter to the State Department. The Minister is discussing this with the Prime Minister this morning and would be glad to have your comments on this proposal. In making the letter public it will of course be necessary to accompany it with a statement making it clear that the allegations made by the Subcommittee were not based on Canadian info and that the action we have taken is based on the necessity of protecting any info in the future which may be passed to USA agencies, e.g. info bearing on joint investigations and info on known communists where they are likely to visit the USA. We shall be drafting a statement along these lines today.

CONFIDENTIAL

In view of the reaction in the House and in the press to Herbert Norman's death we have decided that it would be desirable to deliver a letter to the United States Secretary of State in the following terms. Text begins:

"In the light of the actions taken by the Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the US Senate in publishing testimony taken in executive session concerning the late Mr. E.H. Norman, I am instructed by my Government to inform you with regret that the Canadian Government will be unable in future to supply any security information concerning a Canadian citizen to any US Government agency without an assurance from the US Government that no agency of that government will pass such information to the legislative branch of the US Government without the express consent of the Canadian Government. I am requested to express the hope that the US Government will be able without delay to give such an assurance to the Canadian Government." Text ends.

2. Although I realize that most of the information which has been gathered by the Sub-Committee has come from witnesses called by the Committee who have no doubt repeated evidence already given to the FBI, nonetheless I believe it is desirable to have this on record. In passing this letter to the State Department will you please inform them that we have no desire to upset in any way the long standing and friendly relations between the FBI and the RCM Police. Nor do we wish to upset the new and satisfactory relations between the US Immigration and Naturalization Service and the RCM Police. I do feel however under compulsion to ensure that the maximum protection is given to any information on any Canadian which may be passed to the US Government for the mutual protection of our two countries.

3. Would you please inform me of the time that you will deliver the letter to the State Department to enable Commissioner Nicholson to inform in advance both the FBI and the US Immigration Service of our intention of doing this and give them an assurance that we have no desire to upset the present good relations.

4. Would you also inform the State Department at the same time that I intend to inform the House of Commons of the text of the letter before the House prorogues at the end of the week.[59]

INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE — DRAFT LETTER TO USA SECRETARY OF STATE

We have now redrafted the proposed letter to the USA Secretary of State and my telegram DS88 contains a new proposed text. Following your talk with the Minister and the previous talk between Rae and Crean you will note that this has been generally altered to include the question of establishing orderly procedures for dealing with cases like the Norman case. The Minister has seen this new draft this morning and would like to have your comments as soon as possible. He has agreed to put off making a statement in the House at least until tomorrow.

DRAFT TEXT OF LETTER TO USA SECRETARY OF STATE

"I am instructed by my Government to take up as a matter of urgency with the USA Government, the question of the procedures which have been followed intermittently by the Internal Security Sub-Committee of the Senate Committee on the judiciary in releasing the names of Canadians who have been mentioned in the testimony taken in executive session of that Sub-Committee.

As long ago as August 14, 1951 the Canadian Government complained of the methods employed by that Sub-Committee in releasing the names of Canadians and stated that "if in evidence before investigating committees in Washington the names of Canadian officials appear, the Canadian Government naturally expects that these names can be sent in confidence to the Canadian Government so that the allegations can be investigated here and referred back to the State Department."

Since that time the Canadian Government has reiterated this request to the USA Government. The procedure requested by the Canadian Government has never been acceded to, and the SubCommittee has continued either to release partial testimony to the press without any reference by the USA Government to the Canadian Government, or alternatively has apparently supplied info obtained in executive session to unofficial USA sources. Testimony taken in executive session about any Canadian has never been supplied to the Canadian Government, except through the press. As the USA Government well knows, the Canadian Government finds the continued activities of the Sub-Committee with respect to Canadians as difficult to understand, as it is unfair and indeed intolerable with respect to the Canadians who have been concerned from time to time. The Canadian Government expresses the sincere hope that the USA Government will at long last be able to acquiesce in the requests which the Canadian Government has made from time to time of which the memo of August 14, 1951 is but one example.

The USA Government will appreciate that the Canadian Government has a duty to protect Canadian citizens by all means legally at its disposal. There is little that the Canadian Government can do to protect Canadian citizens, whose names are produced publicly by the legislative branch of the USA Government as the result of testimony taken before congressional committees, without the co-operation of the USA Government. However, the USA Government is aware that the appropriate security agency of the Canadian Government has supplied in the past security info on Canadian citizens to appropriate USA Government agencies on a reciprocal basis when such info forms part of an investigation which is important to the security of our two countries, or where known Canadian communists apply for entry to either country. This exchange of info has assisted in maintaining the security of our two countries. Although the Canadian Government knows of no instance where such info has been improperly used by either government, nonetheless, in present circumstances the Canadian Government considers that it must take every precaution which lies within its jurisdiction to protect Canadian citizens in the future. Accordingly, I am instructed by my Government to inform you with regret that the Canadian Government will be unable in future to supply any security info concerning a Canadian citizen to any USA Government agency without an assurance from the USA Government that no agency of that Government will pass such info to the legislative branch of the USA Government without the express consent of the Canadian Government. I am requested to express the hope that the USA Government will be able without delay to give such an assurance to the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government for its part assures the USA Government that any security info on USA citizens supplied by USA agencies to the Security Agency of the Canadian Government, will be given similar protection in Canada to that now requested with respect to security info about Canadians from the USA Government.

Note de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington], April 9, 1957

CANADA—U.S. SECURITY RELATIONS; U.S. SENATE INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE

Last evening at his request, the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burke Elbrick) called on me at 7:15 to bring to my attention two developments which he regarded as very serious in the proceedings of the Senate Sub-Committee. Hill, the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Affairs, who had been conferring with the Sub-Committee (Morris, the Chief Counsel, I presume) earlier yesterday with regard to the Norman case, reported that the Sub-Committee were intending to go into the charge made by Elizabeth Bentley some years ago that "a high Canadian official" (identified in the press at the time as Mr. Pearson) had leaked American wartime secrets to a known Soviet agent. (This story had been repeated in the Hearst Press recently [New York Journal American, April 1, 1957, "Canadian Spy Secret" by David Sentner]). One feature of this story which concerned the State Department was the reference to the U.S. Foreign Service Officer going to Ottawa to see the Prime Minister and the Minister to inform them of these charges.

2. Elbrick noted from a ticker report during the late afternoon that the Minister was to make a statement on security relations with the United States in the House of Commons the following day (i.e. April 9). It seemed of great importance to the State Department that these difficult problems should be dealt with objectively and not complicated by the natural emotional reaction resulting from the recent behaviour of the Senate Sub-Committee and the Norman tragedy. He suggested that I let Mr. Pearson know at once what the State Department had learned concerning the Sub-Committee's intentions.

3. I told Elbrick that, while we agreed that these matters should be dealt with unemotionally and realistically, he could not expect other than a very violent reaction if the Senate Sub-Committee further confounded their irresponsible behaviour of the past few weeks on Canadian affairs by dragging out this old story about the Minister. I had myself heard earlier that afternoon (from Robert McEwan, a Canadian journalist) that Morris was contemplating an investigation which would involve R.B. Bryce, Secretary of the Canadian Cabinet. Just how ridiculous could you get? I felt sure the Canadian authorities would scorn to do anything to prevent such absurd goings on.

4. Subsequently I communicated the sense of my conversation with Elbrick to the Under-Secretary in Ottawa, Mr. Pearson being unavailable. Léger promised to let the Minister know what had transpired as soon as possible.

5. This morning Mr. Pearson telephoned me at 9:15. He began by saying that the State Department should be given no reason to think that the Canadian authorities had any desire to suppress or have withheld stories involving himself. Canadian opinion, in the event of the Senate Sub-Committee proceeding, would support him and the Government unanimously in condemning the Sub-Committee's action and would become even more violently anti-American than it was already. Personally he had never experienced an atmosphere so critical of the United States on all sides of the House of Commons and throughout the country. The Norman tragedy and the conduct of the Senate Sub-Committee in that connection had sparked the fire and the further actions apparently contemplated by the Sub-Committee could only result in a violent popular explosion. This would not harm the Government but would indeed benefit them politically.

6. The Minister referred to the statement which he was proposing to make today in the House of Commons (and which the Opposition were pressing for) upon security cooperation with the United States. Action was being demanded on all sides and Parliament was on the point of pre-election dissolution. He felt that it was essential to assure the House that Canadian cooperation in security matters would be withheld without categorical assurances from the U.S. Government.

7. I urged Mr. Pearson to defer his proposed statement in the House (and his instructions to present a Note to the State Department) until I had a further opportunity of emphasizing with U.S. authorities the extreme gravity of the situation in terms of Canadian-American relations. It seemed to me, I said, that there were three solid reasons for delaying action at least for twentyfour hours:

(a) if we confined our statement to information deriving from Canadian sources this might prejudice our position respecting information from other sources affecting Canadians (the latter being the Norman case);

(b) there was real risk that the action proposed would imperil the system of security cooperation between the security agencies of the two Governments which was of great value to us as well as to the United States; and

(c) the State Department were presently engaged at the top level in trying to limit and control the actions of Congress in discussions presently being carried on with the Internal Security Sub-Committee; the tide of Congressional and public opinion against the excesses of Eastland, Jenner, et al was rising and violent action on our part might prejudice a successful issue.

8. The Minister agreed that he would hold his statement for twenty-four hours but he could delay it no longer than that. Although he was skeptical that the State Department could (or the Secretary of State would) take any effective action, he agreed that I should see the State Department at once and inform them of the state of opinion in Parliament and in the country. Even such a short delay would be difficult because the Opposition would question him on the opening of the House this morning. (He was trying to persuade Mr. Alistair Stewart of the CCF not to ask a question on the Orders of the Day whether the Government intended to withdraw their Ambassador to Washington.) It would be in order for me to tell U.S. authorities the kind of statement which the Government felt bound to make with regard to security cooperation with the United States.

9. I have now arranged to see the Acting Secretary of State (Herter) and Elbrick at 11:30 this morning and have undertaken to report by telephone to Mr. Pearson if possible before 1:00 o'clock.

10. Mr. Pearson also told me that he was thinking of referring publicly himself to the charges made by Bentley in 1952 (?). Later in the morning he told me that he had given instructions to request permission from the F.B.I. to use the Bentley evidence. At his request I passed on this information to Elbrick for the Acting Secretary. (The object, of course, would be to pour ridicule upon the whole Sub-Committee proceedings with regard to Canadian officials.)

CANADA-U.S. SECURITY RELATIONS; U.S. SENATE INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE

Following for the Minister and Under-Secretary only. Following our first telephone conversation this morning, I decided to request an immediate interview with the Acting Secretary of State, Christian Herter. He received me at 11:30 a.m. Elbrick was with him.

2. I began by referring to the old proceedings in which you yourself feature in connection with Bentley's "testimony". (This was the veiled subject of the Sentner article in the N.Y. Journal-American of April 1 reported in telegram from Consul-General in New York No. 970† of that date.) I also mentioned in confidence what Robert McKeown had told us yesterday of his conversation with Morris in which the latter had spoken of Bob Bryce as a next object for the sub-Committee's attentions. Such fantastic and ridiculous allegations indicated to us the lengths to which the sub-Committee seemed prepared to go.

3. I conveyed to Herter your appreciation of the temper of the House of Commons, irrespective of party, and of Canadian opinion generally, pointing out that it was difficult to overstate the seriousness of the possible implications for Canadian-American relations, particularly if the sub-Committee were now contemplating further attacks. I mentioned the suggestion being made in some quarters (including Parliament) that our Ambassador in Washington be withdrawn, and your own efforts to prevent extremes of this kind.

4. So far as the references to yourself were concerned, I made it quite clear to Herter that it was entirely up to the sub-Committee whether or not they went ahead and produced the so-called "evidence". You would want it to be understood quite clearly that we were not making any suggestions whatever that the State Department take any steps or make any effort to suppress these allegations. However, if such stories continued to be bandied about, the repercussions in Canada would be very serious indeed. In the present exacerbated temper of Canadian opinion, failure to resolve these matters and to deal with them responsibly could not fail to affect the Canadian attitude not only on the handling of security problems between the two countries, but also on other matters where, as both of us will know, close Canadian-American cooperation was of great importance, not only to our two countries but to the whole Western alliance.

5. I went on to tell Herter that we would be presenting a further Note, tomorrow (April 10) and that you would be making a statement then in the House on cooperation in the exchange of security information. I described your views on the lines of paragraph 1 of your telegram No. DS86 of April 8. You had agreed to defer the presentation of the Note, and your statement for twenty-four hours, despite Parliamentary pressure, in order to give us here an opportunity of bringing the gravity of the situation once more to his (Herter's) attention for such action as might be open to the Administration.

6. Herter was entirely sympathetic in his reaction. He recognized not only the depth of feeling in Canada on this whole subject, but its dangers for further deterioration in Canadian-American relations. He feared, however, that Senator Jenner was ready to "strike back" in reply to your own public references to the sub-Committee. The Administration were making every effort to restrain Jenner, but Herter was not optimistic that they would succeed. Private soundings had indicated that even a letter from the President would be likely only to "spur him on". Mr. Eisenhower had taken the matter up through Senator Knowland, and the Administration would do all they could to calm down the extreme members of the sub-Committee, as a basis for more responsible procedures in the future.

7. Before leaving, I drew Herter's attention to the statement which Dulles had made at a press conference on November 24, 1953, concerning the reports respecting yourself.[60] It was, of course, for the Administration to decide, but a high level public statement concerning the proceedings of the sub-Committee might have some effect.

8. It was agreed that I should call on the Acting Secretary again tomorrow morning, April 10, to present our Note and inform him of your intentions with regard to your Parliamentary statement. At that time he would let me know what he had learned in the interim concerning the sub-Committee's intentions.

9. Following our later telephone conversation, I have now told Elbrick that you have given instructions to request F.B.I. consent for you to make public use of the Bentley testimony if you saw fit. I also urged the importance of a reply to our Note of protest of March 18.

10. Since preparing the above paragraphs, Elbrick telephoned after 6:00 o'clock this evening to pass on word from Herter that Jenner had "calmed down considerably" and was now inclined to "remain calm" unless there were some further development (in Canada) which provoked him to further public reactions. Elbrick added that of course the Senator was quite unpredictable and that this impression was conveyed to us without any guarantee that it was correct. It was obvious, however, that the State Department hoped that your statement in the House of Commons tomorrow would not provide Jenner with an excuse for violent counter-statement.

11. Elbrick has now just told me their reply to our Note of protest will be ready for us tomorrow morning and that the Acting Secretary will receive me at 11:15. Please let me have any further instructions you may have first thing in the morning, including your wishes concerning publication of the Note of protest and the reply. The State Department's reply will not, I judge, be very constructive, or on the other hand very contentious.

CANADA-U.S. SECURITY PROCEDURES; NOTE TO ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE

1. Following our several telephone conversations this morning I called with Rae at the State Department just before one o'clock where I was received by the Acting Secretary (Herter), Robert Murphy, the Deputy Under Secretary, and Elbrick, Assistant Secretary (European Affairs) to present the Note set out in your telegram under reference with the minor revision in the first paragraph which you authorized by telephone.

2. I read the Note in their presence, and added certain general comments. On the basis of your telegram DS86 of April 8, para 2, I said that, although we had found it necessary to take this step, we had no desire to upset the long-standing and friendly relations between the F.B.I. and the R.C.M.P., nor the new and satisfactory arrangements between the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service and the R.C.M.P., to both of which we attached importance. Further, we considered it important in our joint interest to maintain this close co-operation in the security field, as in other fields. At the same time, in view of recent events, the Government of Canada was under compulsion to ensure that the maximum protection was in fact provided to any information which might be passed to the United States Government concerning any Canadian.

3. I then went on to say that you would be making a statement on this subject in the House of Commons at 2:30 this afternoon when you would quote the text of the Note I was then presenting.[61]

4. The USA officials listened gravely to my reading of the Note and to my observations. There is, in my mind, no doubt whatever that they received our communication with serious concern. Herter remarked that, as we knew, the Administration had been bending their efforts to reducing the temperature of the Senate sub-Committee. He was afraid that this communication of ours would re-open the whole issue and send Senatorial blood pressure soaring; the public reactions of Jenner and Co. would almost certainly be violent. He was sorry that we had felt bound to raise this general question in the immediate wake of the Norman case, where information from Canadian sources passed by the executive to the legislative branch was not involved but rather the conduct of the sub-Committee respecting the testimony of witnesses and reports originating in the United States. He hoped this distinction could be made clear in Ottawa.

5. There is no doubt that Herter and Murphy (in particular) were seriously disturbed by the last paragraph in our Note concerning the possibility of our present security cooperation being suspended. Murphy came back to this at least twice. All that I could do was to repeat that we had no wish to disturb present arrangements and that we, too, felt continued cooperation to be of great importance in our joint interest.

6. Herter then drew attention to the substantial point of fact which I discussed with you by telephone immediately from Herter's office. This was the assertion in para 3 of the Note that "this procedure requested by the Canadian Government has never been followed". Both Herter and Murphy pointed out that, in the case of the Bonbright visit to Ottawa in October 1952, at least, the procedure which we wanted had been followed precisely; references made to Canadians in proceedings of the sub-Committee had in fact been transmitted to the Canadian Government in confidence by special messenger. When I drew this to your attention on the telephone, you at once agreed to a suitable amendment of this para 3 and subsequently gave me the revised text repeated in the following para of this message.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1957, Volume III, pp. 3358-3359.

This was then substituted for the former para 3 and a clean amended original of the Note delivered to the State Department.

7. Text of para 3 begins: "In our view, it is essential that this procedure requested by the Canadian Government should be followed and that reference made in proceedings of the sub-Committee to individual Canadians should not first be made known to the Canadian Government through the press." Text ends.

8. You also instructed me on the telephone when making the above revision to insert the word "actually" between the words "procedures" and "adopted" in para 4. This was done.

9. At the same interview today, Herter handed me the text of the U.S.A. Note of April constituting the State Department's reply to our earlier Note of March 18.[62] He suggested that if this first exchange were to be made public (as we contemplated), this should be done at once to avoid confusion with our new Note which you were to read to the House this afternoon. To this I felt bound to agree (although the U.S.A. reply as you will have noted is pretty unsatisfactory from our point of view). The text of the U.S.A. Note was repeated to you in our earlier telegram No. 840 of April 10.

10. Finally I should I think repeat what I said to you when we spoke last on the telephone before you went into the House this afternoon about the attitude of the State Department in this unhappy business. From the Secretary down, they have certainly taken our problem seriously. Herter, Murphy and Elbrick have been particularly understanding of our problems. All of them were profoundly shocked by Herbert Norman's death. The most senior officers have made themselves available to us for consultation immediately and on short notice. Furthermore, it is my belief that the State Department, in particular Herter and Murphy, have made genuine efforts directly and through the White House to impress upon the members of the sub-Committee the serious consequences of their dealing with Canadian affairs as they have done in the Norman case. Although this certainly does not excuse, at least in Canadian eyes, the unwillingness of the Administration to speak out publicly against the conduct of members of the sub-Committee and its staff, nor the administrative bungling which led an official of the State Department to concur or acquiesce in the sub-Committee's proceedings being made public, it should be remembered in extenuation that the State Department itself has a long and baleful history of pursuit by the same Congressional persecutors and is conscious of the severe limitations upon its own influence with Congress. This, of course, is not to say that the State Department could not have done better from our point of view. It could have apologized, for example, for the error of its own officer in permitting publication of the Norman testimony. But it does go some way toward explaining the Department's position.

11. As you authorized me to do by telephone, I expressed to Herter, Murphy and Elbrick (through the last named) your appreciation of their attitude and efforts.

CANADA-UNITED STATES SECURITY RELATIONS; PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S VIEWS

This morning, as a result of an appointment I had made last week through Governor Adams, I called on the President just before noon to say goodbye. He was in good vigorous form and, after a few pleasantries about my mission, introduced the subject of the difficulties between our two countries arising from proceedings in the Senate Sub-Committee on Internal Security.[63]

2. Mr. Eisenhower in effect repeated what he had said in his press conference of yesterday,[64] April 10, the verbatim record of which is contained in our telegram under reference. He went on to say that he had been very much disturbed by the deterioration in the relations with Canada and that nothing should be allowed to interfere with our mutual confidence. He hoped that what he had said to the press would help to restore normally good feeling.

3. I said that, as the President had gathered, Canadian opinion had been very deeply moved by what had occurred. Herbert Norman's death had of course intensified the reactions of Canadians but, and apart from this tragedy, Canadians were very angry indeed at what they regarded as the unjustified interference by the Senate sub-Committee and its staff (I named Jenner and Morris as particular targets of Canadian criticism) in Canadian affairs. I of course expressed entire agreement that it would be a great pity for both of us if recent events led to a breakdown in the traditional cooperation between our two countries of which Mr. Eisenhower had spoken with enthusiasm.

4. The President expressed understanding of Canadian resentment of the Senate sub-Committee's actions. However, under the U.S. system of Government (and some might well regard this as a bad system from some points of view) the Executive simply did not control the Congress. If he had openly criticized Senator Jenner (whom he admitted was "nuts") this would simply have resulted in blowing up the importance of the Senators in question and giving them a new lease of life. He had refused to be drawn into the McCarthy controversy and look what had happened to the Senator from Wisconsin. He hoped the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson understood this.

5. I said that I was quite sure that members of the Canadian Government understood the distinction and the difficulties involved in such matters through the division of powers. Nevertheless the Canadian people generally could not be expected to appreciate the USA constitutional position which was so unlike their own. I felt sure, however, that Mr. St. Laurent and you would be glad to have this personal explanation from Mr. Eisenhower (which he had asked me to convey to you).

6. As there were a great many journalists, television and film representatives awaiting my departure, it was agreed with Hagerty, the President's Press Officer, that when I left it would be said by both of us that while the purpose of my call was to take leave of the President, Mr. Eisenhower had taken the opportunity of expressing once more his regret concerning the tragedy in Cairo and explaining the U.S.A. position along the lines of his press conference of yesterday. This in fact was what was done, although what gloss the press will put upon our chat, which lasted perhaps twenty minutes, remains to be seen.

STATEMENTS MADE TO THE PRESS BY SENATE INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE AND BY STATE DEPT.

We understand that, following publication of Minister's statement in the House yesterday, members of the Internal Security Sub-Committee met last night to prepare a press statement. Urgent efforts were made, mainly through Hill, Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, to stop the issue of a statement. The sequence of ensuing events seems to have been that the statement was telephoned this morning to news offices by the Sub-Committee, and, according to the A.P. ticker report, "shortly thereafter staff members had called back to say that Senator Eastland had directed that it be withdrawn." The Sub-Committee, however, was not able to (or in any event, did not) stop INS and the Chicago Tribune from carrying the statement. We have received the text through the good offices of the State Department.

2. Text Begins:

The State Department did not and could not disclaim the action of the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee in releasing the testimony relative to John K. Emmerson (Counselor of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, Lebanon) and Ambassador Norman.

The truth is, that before the testimony which contains reference to Ambassador Norman was released the transcript was cleared for publication by the State Department. The release was then approved by every member of the Sub-Committee except one Senator who was ill.

The facts are, further, that shortly thereafter the State Department, which has access to the security agencies, which we do not have, was asked by us to verify from the Federal Bureau of Investigation the truth and the accuracy of the Sub-Committee's information and evidence concerning Norman.

The State Department informed the Sub-Committee that it had already checked with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and had corroborated the truth and accuracy of the Sub-Committee's information and evidence.

The Internal Security Sub-Committee is conscious of its duties and obligations to the Senate and to the American people. The Sub-Committee shall at all times conduct its responsibilities in this light. Text Ends.

3. Lincoln White, State Department press officer, was subjected today to a barrage of questions, and our information on what was said is, at the moment, incomplete. From the A.P. ticker it appears that the State Department spokesman "replied with an emphatic 'no' today when asked whether the Department ever had given the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee any Secret security data on Canadian diplomat E. Herbert Norman." In addition, White is reported by A.P. ticker to have "said Robert F. Cartwright, the Department's Deputy Security Chief, never approved publication by the Sub-Committee of any derogatory information about Norman; related that Eastland rejected an appeal from Under Secretary of State Christian Herter to withhold publicity about the allegations against Norman."

4. Lister of the State Department took the initiative in telephoning us to give us the text of the line taken by White in answering press queries as to the responsibility of the security officer of the State Department for clearance of the Emmerson testimony. We understand from Lister that White's brief on this point was on the following lines: Text Begins:

There is apparently a misunderstanding on this point. The Department's understanding of the facts are as follows:

A representative of the State Department's Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs, who was present at the hearings, did indicate that the State Department would have no objections to the public release of the testimony of Mr. Emmerson, a State Department employee. Mr. Emmerson's testimony contained no adverse references to any Canadian official. Apparently the Sub-Committee interpreted this comment as meaning that the State Department had no objection to the release of the entire transcript which included derogatory information about a Canadian official which had been introduced into the record by the Sub-Committee itself. Text Ends.

5. As you will be aware, these statements and counter-statements leave open a good many questions. We think, however, it would be advisable to let the dust settle a bit before seeking from the State Department the answers to some of these questions, and to see what is published before making our inquiries.

6. Senator Green has issued a further strong statement about the Sub-Committee's "interference in the affairs of a foreign government", the text of which will be forwarded as soon as possible.

STATEMENTS MADE TO THE PRESS BY SENATE INTERNAL SECURITY SUB-COMMITTEE AND BY STATE DEPARTMENT

We called on Lister of the State Department this morning to check on yesterday's developments. He referred at the beginning to E.W. Kenworthy's story in today's New York Times under the heading "Norman Case Data Traced to Army Intelligence Corps". The first four paragraphs of this article are repeated in my immediately following telegram.†

2. We raised in particular the question of the responsibility, of the State Department security officer who is alleged to have cleared the first hearings. Lister said that, from the two statements made yesterday on behalf of the Sub-Committee and by the State Department (reported in my telegram under reference), the record was clear that despite the Sub-Committee's charge that the transcript was cleared for publication by the State Department, the facts were that the State Department security officer in question had indicated only that the State Department would have no objections to the release of the testimony of Emmerson, and that this was wrongly interpreted by the Sub-Committee as meaning that the State Department had no objection to the release of the entire transcript. Although this is the public position of the State Department, it is hardly a satisfactory explanation.

3. The second point which we were anxious to pursue was the statement in the Sub-Committee's release of yesterday with reference to the "security report" that the State Department had informed the Sub-Committee "that it had already checked with the FBI and had corroborated the truth and accuracy of the Sub-Committee evidence". Lister said that the facts were as follows: Immediately after the publication of the first hearing, and before our protest of March 18th three State Department officials, including himself, had met informally with Morris and urged again that there should be no publication of material concerning this Canadian official, stressing the adverse effect on Canadian-American relations which further action would have. In these discussions, Morris had raised the question whether the State Department had checked whether the reports available to the Sub-Committee represented the same kind of evidence available to the State Department through the FBI. After checking, the State Department security officer was said to have indicated that the material available to the State Department from its security sources contained allegations and information of a similar type. Lister said this was a far cry from a corroboration by the State Department of the truth or accuracy of the Sub-Committee's "evidence".

4. In dealing with this second aspect through its official spokesman yesterday, the State Department considered that it would have been difficult to make a long and detailed statement revealing the relationships between the State Department and United States government security agencies. In order not to become involved in a public wrangle with the Committee over points of information and so-called "evidence", particularly on charges made in a Sub-Committee statement which they had sought to withdraw, it had been decided not to take up this question frontally. White's briefing was to the effect that on this point he was to say that it was not appropriate for the State Department to comment publicly on its relationships with security agencies of the government.

5. This, as I am sure you will agree, is a pretty murky field, but you will wish to have Lister's indication of what lay behind yesterday's public statements and counter-statements.

6. We enquired again about the Tsuru testimony. Lister said that as far as he was aware, there were two public hearings, and that while the Sub-Committee has produced its own "internal" working document, the normal practice was to hold up publication until the end of the year. The State Department hopes to obtain informally, and on a loan basis, the summary of these two hearings which, he pointed out, might or might not become the final version.

7. We have told Lister that we have seen partial excerpts from an internal document of the Sub-Committee relating to the Tsuru hearings (see our tel. no. 838 of April 10†), and he is making efforts to get full copies for us.

8. One final point which he raised privately, and which you will wish to check with the records, is the extent to which, following our representations in 1951, an actual and firm assurance was received from the State Department. His reading of the record was that although the Executive had been anxious and willing to do everything in its power to meet our original request, our earlier discussions had been on an oral basis, and the Senate Sub-Committee had not in the past made it possible for the State Department to give us an unqualified assurance. From our incomplete records here, it would appear that the final position of the Sub-Committee was summarized orally for us by the State Department and reported in our WA3202 of August 24, 1951. Our records, however, are incomplete, and you may wish to check this point carefully in Ottawa.

9. Finally, we wish to draw your attention to the important problem of how you would wish us to deal with further press enquiries on this case here. The press corps has shown an enormous interest in the details of the case, and, for the most part, have based their stories on the only "evidence" available to them, which is the Sub-Committee's transcripts. In search of further background, and often in order to rebut some of the charges against Norman, they have been pressing us for information and details which we are not here in a position to give. There have also been requests for information, which we are not meeting, as to our security procedures in Canada. We are trying to hold the line on the basis of our own published statements on this case, and without entering into the rebuttal of individual charges and accusations.

10. This is necessary in any event because of the incompleteness of our records, apart from other considerations. You will however wish to give serious thought from a policy point of view to the question of whether it would be possible and useful to prepare in Ottawa a rebuttal of some of the more obvious allegations concerning Norman, as these have appeared in the Sub-Committee's testimony. If you decide that something of this kind can be done, we would, of course, wish to be kept fully and promptly briefed here, so that we can be as much help as possible. On the other hand, you may consider that our best course would be to avoid a continuous public exchange with the Sub-Committee on their individual charges.

REPERCUSSIONS OF THE NORMAN CASE

Following for Léger. Following the debate in the House of Commons on Friday (April 12), there are indications that, in relation to opinion in the United States, we are now entering an even more difficult phase. In the absence of detailed refutation of the charges made in the sub-Committee and repeated in sections of the USA press, there is now likely to be a growing tendency here to take the line that they have more substance than has yet been admitted by Canada. Lawrence's column in The Washington Star last evening, April 15, and Sokolsky's piece in The Washington Post and Times Herald this morning (referred to in para 3 below) indicate the nature of our apprehensions. Press comments in Canada following the Parliamentary discussion on Friday will tend to stimulate the energetic behind-the-scenes activities of the sub-Committee Counsel. This development, with the unaggressive position taken by the Executive Branch, is likely to reduce to the vanishing point the prospect of the Congress itself doing anything to achieve more responsible procedures in the future.

2. The central issue, between the two governments, is essentially the procedural one, viz., that there is an obligation on the Executive and on Congress to use the confidential diplomatic channel for communicating to the Canadian Government information which arises in Congressional hearings about Canadians. At the same time, so far as the case of Herbert Norman is concerned, we are likely to find a widening area of public doubt and critical comment which will increase in the absence of specific rebuttal.

3. David Lawrence's article is headed "Questions on the Norman Case". In it Lawrence writes "that it now turns out that there is a great deal of doubt as to what was really covered by the Canadian Government's denial as uttered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs" (the reference is to your statement of April 12), and that "the mystery is as big as ever". After repeating in full the exchanges with Mr. Diefenbaker in the House, Lawrence goes on to repeat a number of old charges. The relevant excerpt from his article is contained in my telegram 905.† Sokolsky in a less dangerous and looser piece characterizes the Minister as "anti-American".

4. In paras. 9 and 10 of my telegram under reference, the question of counter-measures was raised. In addition to the enquiries from the press and public which we are receiving here, we have had similar requests from some of the Consular missions for background information which could be used, if not in contacts with the press, at least in private discussions. We are also receiving a considerable volume of letters at the Embassy. For the most part, they are in the nature of expressions of opinion, and our view here is that no reply is required, but since you will be receiving even a greater volume in Ottawa, it would be helpful to have an indication of your attitude and practice.

5. In addition to our present conclusion that the turn may be away from the general support of the Canadian position evident at the outset of this crisis, there is the possibility that the Senate consideration of the nomination of Scott McLeod will provide a further occasion not only for McLeod's critics to express their views, but for his supporters to point to the Norman case as a positive achievement in the field of internal security.

6. I thought you should have our assessment of the immediate prospects as a basis for considering the problems posed in paras 9 and 10 of our telegram 879.

FURTHER TESTIMONY CONCERNING A CANADIAN OFFICIAL

Since you have now mentioned the possibility of an additional Canadian name being published directly or indirectly by the Subcommittee I believe it would be wise to approach the State Department and tell them if there are to be any more names which have not already been mentioned publicly that the info about them should be passed in confidence to the Canadian Government to be dealt with here in Canada in accordance with the requests we have made in the past. We would also expect that the Subcommittee would not publish the name or names although we realize that the so-called "internal" working document is already in the hands of the press.

2. We think that an approach of this kind is consistent with the stand we have taken with the USA Government since 1951 although we have never asked or received as firm an assurance as we requested in our latest Note last week. We should be interested to hear the results of your approach to the State Department. With reference to your paragraph 9 on relations with the press you should stand on the statements made by the Minister in the House including that made last Friday.

FURTHER TESTIMONY CONCERNING A CANADIAN OFFICIAL

Following for the Minister and Under-Secretary Only: Following our telephone conversation at noon today, I called on Robert Murphy, Deputy Under Secretary, primarily to deal with the specific request in the Department's telegram under reference. Lister of B.N.A. was also present.

2. I told Murphy (as we had indicated earlier to Lister) that we had heard through individual Canadian correspondents of the existence of an "internal" document of the Internal Security Sub-Committee which, in its sections dealing with the Tsuru hearings, contained references to a Canadian official. So far as we were aware, these references had not been made public, but the possibility of their being published directly or indirectly by the Sub-Committee made it necessary for us to indicate that we would expect that the Sub-Committee would not publish this name, or the names of any other Canadians, and that if there are any further names which have not already been mentioned publicly, the information about them should be passed in confidence to the Canadian Government to be dealt with in Canada in accordance with the requests which we have made repeatedly. This was the procedure referred to most recently in paras 2 and 3 of our note of April 10.

3. In making this point with specific reference to the name of the Canadian official mentioned in the Tsuru testimony, I made it clear that this request did not affect the view previously transmitted to the State Department that so far as your own name is concerned, you would not wish me to take any action to suggest that the State Department should take any steps or make any effort to suppress these old allegations. In so doing, I drew attention to the fact that I had made this point earlier (see para 4 of my telegram 835 of April 9).

4. Lister said that on the first assurance requested in our note of April 10, concerning the general procedure to be followed in future, the moment was not opportune to press the sub-Committee, and he thought that the chances of obtaining a reasonably satisfactory assurance on this point (which of course affects directly the State Department's reply to our note of April 10) would be improved by waiting a few days. Both Murphy and Lister agreed, however, that our request with reference to the specific case arising out of the Tsuru hearings would be brought by the State Department to the attention of the Sub-Committee as a matter of urgency.

5. I also took the occasion to suggest that the State Department should send us as soon as possible at least an interim reply to our note of April 10 in as forthcoming terms as possible. Murphy indicated that this was in the mill, and that he hopes to be able to give us something today or tomorrow.[65]

6. Both Murphy and Lister were concerned at the possibility of the Norman case and its repercussions becoming an electoral issue in Canada, with the consequence that the fires of controversy would be fed down here. I told them frankly that it was already a matter of serious public controversy in Canada which made it all the more important for the USA Administration to move as quickly and effectively as possible to obtain a reasonable solution of their problems with the Senate Sub-Committee.

7. Subsequently I said to Murphy that, if necessary, you wished to be in a position to use publicly all material made available to the Canadian authorities through security channels concerning Canadians mentioned in Sub-Committee proceedings. You had already made this request through the usual route with respect to the Bentley testimony. There may be difficulty in obtaining compliance with the former more general request.

CANADIAN NOTE OF APRIL 10 RE EXCHANGE OF SECURITY INFORMATION

At the request of Lister, Deputy Director, BNA, we called at the State Department this afternoon so that he might raise on an informal basis one or two questions which have arisen in the course of their consultations with other Executive agencies here on the preparation of a reply to the Canadian Note of April 10 regarding the exchange of security information.

2. Lister said that in their own minds they had divided the Canadian note into two main parts: the first dealing with the complaint against the Internal Security Sub-Committee, and the request that names of Canadians referred to in proceedings should not first be made known to the Canadian Government through the press, but should be dealt with in confidence between the two Governments. The second part of the Canadian note relates to the assurances required in connection with the reciprocal exchange of security information, as set forth in the penultimate part of the Note of April 10.

[65] Le département d'État a communiqué une réponse provisoire à l'ambassade du Canada le 18 avril 1957. Cette note a convaincu Heeney que le point de vue du Canada recevait une «serious attention» et qu'il serait «pursued vigorously». Voir United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXVII, No. 949, September 2, 1957, p. 389.

The State Department delivered an interim reply to the Canadian Embassy on April 18, 1957. This note assured Heeney that Canadian views were receiving "serious attention" and would be "pursued vigorously". See United States, Department of State Bulletin, Volume XXXVII, No. 949, September 2, 1957, p. 389.

3. Referring to the second part of the Note, Lister said that preliminary consultations with the security agencies here and with other executive agencies concerned underlined the wide area covered in the reciprocal exchange of security information between agencies of the two governments; for example, the Office of Naval Intelligence and the Coast Guard had some responsibilities in the provision of information affecting Canadian Seamen inter alia to ship owners. (Immigration exchanges are presumably another field). There was also the fact that a number of agencies employed a wide definition of "security information" to include any information of a classified character. Lister said that he assumed that our request related only to information concerning Canadian citizens provided by the Canadian Government in which the question of Communist or subversive leanings was actually involved, and not security information in the wider sense he had mentioned. In this event, he indicated that the present arrangements, for example between the R.C.M.P. and the F.B.I., to the best of his knowledge already made careful provision for the safeguarding of this information on the lines requested.

4. Secondly, he said that in these preliminary discussions the question had been raised as to whether by the request that the expressed consent of the Canadian Government should be given in each case, we intended to modify the existing established security channels for the exchange of such information, and for the obtaining of any specific clearances with respect to its use. He thought that any effort to transfer these channels to the State Department level would only create unnecessary difficulties, and raise real problems.

5. We said in reply that while we would seek clarification, our understanding was that the penultimate part of our Note referred to security information in the narrow sense that he had mentioned. Furthermore, we said that we were sure that you were, as we had indicated earlier, anxious that the existing close day-to-day co-operation between the security agencies of the two countries continue, and that these would, of course, continue to be the normal channels for the reciprocal exchange of this information, and for implementing any safeguards required in its use. Presumably the reply could reaffirm the basic principle. Lister summed up by saying that in this part of their reply it might not be possible to go beyond a re-affirmation of what he understood to be the present practice.

6. On the first part of the Note, which we observed was of substantial importance to us, Lister said that he could not give an indication at this stage of the character of their reply. He referred again to the constitutional problem, and commented wryly that if the State Department were to make the flat statement in reply to us that the Sub-Committee would not be permitted to publish Canadian names, this might only have the unfortunate effect of stimulating them to stick to their prerogatives. At the same time, we inferred that the State Department at high levels is pressing its efforts with senior Senators to see that in practice the recent unfortunate developments do not recur. Therefore, while it may be that no definitive assurances may be forthcoming on this point, the State Department clearly expect that in practice the Sub-Committee will mend its ways.

7. I am sure you will share Lister's concern on the exchange of "security information" that any further steps open to the State Department should retain the present close working relationships between security agencies of the two governments, and that a satisfactory reply, particularly on the exchange of security information, can best be made in the light of the clarifications he has requested. We will meet with him again as soon as your comments have been received.

CANADIAN NOTE OF APR 10 RE EXCHANGE OF SECURITY INFO

1. Your paragraph 3. Would you inform Lister that he is quite right in saying that we are concerned in the Note only with security info concerning Canadians provided by the Canadian Government or any of its agencies. This type of info is only concerned with persons about whom there is evidence or suspicion of Communist or subversive leanings. We are not concerned in the Note with security info in the wider sense, e.g. general intelligence info or classified material.

2. While we agree in general that the RCMP and FBI are careful about safeguarding this info the problem of passing such info to the legislative branch arises in our view primarily from the passing of such info from the FBI or possibly USA immigration with whom the RCMP have an agreement, to other executive agencies and thence to the legislative branch. By way of illustration you might point out to Lister as indeed I believe you have done already that we are now satisfied that the now well publicized February 1950 report in the Norman case was passed to G-2 and thence by some unknown means to the Subcommittee. In this respect we are now in some difficulty because it appears that the New York Times knows more than we do. The New York Times of April 19 in a news report datelined Washington April 18, which follows on Tania Long's report, states that on November 1, 1950 Hoover sent a report on Norman to General Bolling, the then Head of G-2, and that this contained info supplied by the RCMP. It would appear fairly clear that the security memo from which Morris quoted in the Subcommittee was a G-2 memo containing this info. This is the type of thing we intend to guard against and about which we wish an assurance and we should incidentally be glad to have any detailed explanation which Lister could give us. It would be helpful if they were prepared to give us a copy of the Canadian info in it or at least let us have sight of the report from which Morris quoted. What we would like to have is a general assurance that no executive branch of government would pass info on to the public or to the legislative branch without our specific consent.

3. With respect to the channels through which our consent might be obtained in each case we suggest tentatively that it might be satisfactory if the question of clearance was first raised through the agencies with which the RCMP have direct dealings namely the FBI and the security branch of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. We might give the Canadian Government's reply through this channel. On the other hand if the matter were to be an issue between the two governments, the State Department would have to be brought in as would you; and indeed even if we agreed to the release of info surely the State Department would have to know in any event. We would however be glad to meet their administrative difficulties as best we can, bearing in mind what we are trying to prevent.

4. Will you assure Lister that we have no desire whatsoever to alter the present close working relationships between the security agencies of the two governments or indeed to restrict the legitimate flow of security info which is in both our interests. On the other hand we have a duty to prevent such info leaking or being given to the Legislative Branch.

5. Your paragraph 6. With respect to the Subcommittee itself publishing Canadian names we can do no more than impress as we have on the State Department the necessity of giving us a satisfactory practical answer. We are quite adamant that the practice should cease. As you know (and this for your info only) the answer to the problem is a political one. Presidents in the past have many times taken political action within their own party, which has been effective and has little to do with the constitution, but is often the only way to make government in the USA reasonably orderly.

6. Your telegram 934 April 18.† I agree with the line you took with Dulles. We would prefer a satisfactory reply even in a week or two rather than a hastily prepared one now.

7. So far as the release to Time by the Subcommittee of the Tsuru story is concerned, I think it advisable not to make a new specific complaint. When you next talk to the State Department about the substance of this telegram, however, I suggest you use this latest incident as yet another example of why we must have a satisfactory practical answer to our Note of April 10 or else we will have to reserve our right to take action in regard to the release of security info in the future.

CANADIAN NOTE OF APRIL 10 RE EXCHANGE OF SECURITY INFORMATION

The clarifications and supplementary information in your telegram have been given orally to Lister. He said that this information will be helpful in their further consultations with the other executive departments and agencies concerned.

2. During our call on Lister, he remarked that while he thought they would probably be able to give us a substantial reply within the next week or so dealing fairly satisfactorily with the second of the two points in our Note, they were having great trouble in attempting to deal at all formally with the first point (i.e., the publication by Congressional Committees of Canadian names derived from non-Canadian sources). This latter question had been discussed with the Congressional Relations people at some length and had been examined by Secretary Dulles before his departure for Bonn. Lister's impression from these various discussions was that the first point in our Note might be omitted entirely from any reply given to us within the next week or so or might merely be mentioned with an indication that it would be dealt with in a separate communication at a later date. If, of course, nothing was said about the point in the reply, the State Department would undoubtedly explain the position to us orally, much as they had done in 1952. Lister asked us for our personal opinion on the course which should be followed. We said that while the first point was one about which the Canadian Government was able to do less than it could about the second point, it was not for that reason considered by the Canadian authorities to be any less important. We referred again to the matter mentioned in your para. 7 as an illustration of the kind of happening in this category which could have serious consequences and which both of us should be anxious to prevent. We said we thought that the omission from their reply of any reference to the first point would seem rather strange and would provoke considerable public criticism in Canada. We also doubted that it would be wise merely to indicate in the initial reply that the first point would be dealt with later. There might be some puzzlement as to why the answer on this point was being delayed and an excessive amount of attention might be drawn to the reply if and when it is eventually made. On balance, our personal opinion was that it would be best to have the one reply deal as satisfactorily as possible with both points.

3. Lister appreciated our comments but still foresaw serious obstacles to the course which we favoured. He indicated that before any reply is made to our Note he will discuss the matter further with us.

REPLY TO NOTE CONCERNING EXCHANGE OF PERSONNEL SECURITY INFO

We have now been shown privately and confidentially the present text of the draft USA reply. This text has been pretty thoroughly cleared and was this morning approved by Under-Secretary Herter. It is not certain whether Secretary Dulles' formal approval will be considered necessary as the substance of it has been discussed fully with him by the Under-Secretary already. The only other step which apparently is planned within the USA Government is to inform certain congressional leaders of the proposed lines of the final reply in order to lessen the likelihood of their taking umbrage when the text is published.

2. Although we were not given a copy of the Note, our examination of it enables us to report more exactly on its contents than we were able to do this morning on the basis of the rather imprecise hints by Murphy and Lister.

3. The opening paragraph of the Note, which deals with our representations concerning the publication of Canadian names by the Subcommittee, refrains from delivering the expected lecture on the independence of the legislative branch. It merely refers to our request and indicates that our views have been communicated to and discussed with those concerned in the Congress. It adds that in doing so the State Department emphasized the importance which it attaches to the friendliest relations with Canada. The paragraph concludes with the statement that this appreciation of the importance of relations with Canada is also "entertained by the Congress".

4. The next paragraph refers to our request concerning the handling of info about Canadians communicated to the Executive Branch by the Canadian authorities. It indicates that the assurances sought by us are consistent with the present practice. It observes that among the security agencies of the USA Government the principle is accepted that an agency receiving info is not free to communicate it to others without the approval of the "originating agency". It then remarks that the State Department "understands" that the same principle applies to the exchange of info between Canadian and USA agencies.

5. The Note concludes with a paragraph on the importance which the continued exchange of this kind of info has had and will have for the security of both countries. It observes finally that this is one of the many fields in which friendly cooperation between Canada and the USA is of great value.

6. When we were shown this text, we were invited to let the State Department have very informally this afternoon or tomorrow morning any comments which we might wish to make on:

(a) Contents of the Note (on which we doubt that the State Department would be very receptive to suggestions at this stage in view of the process through which this text has gone);

(b) The timing of the reply (on which the State Department officials concerned recognize that we might or might not think it appropriate for us to offer very definite advice in view of their own familiarity with the situation both here and in Canada and in view of the interpretation which might be given to such advice from us); and

(c) The publicity to be given to the Note (by either the USA or Canadian Governments or by both).

7. The official with whom we talked indicated that in the ordinary course (and especially in the absence of contrary advice from us), he personally would expect the State Department to send its reply to us not later than the first half of next week.

REPLY TO NOTE CONCERNING EXCHANGE OF PERSONNEL SECURITY INFORMATION

It is difficult for me to comment on the substance of the proposed US reply. It would be easy enough to pick flaws in it since it is not by any means fully responsive to the two main requests made in our Note. However unsatisfactory we may find this reply, I am satisfied it is about the best we can get now and it is probably as good as we would be likely to receive even if it were to be delayed for some time.

2. In expressing this opinion I have very much in mind what the President said to me about the difficulties involved in working the political system here. In some circumstances I suppose it is conceivable that the President might be prepared to engage in a real battle over the kinds of constitutional questions raised by our requests and particularly by the one relating to the conduct of Congressional Committees. In the present situation, when relations between Congress and the Executive are rather strained and when difficulties are being experienced on major parts of the Administration's programme (including the Budget itself) I cannot imagine President Eisenhower joining issue with Congress on these security and human rights matters, even though he may personally feel quite strongly about them.

3. In this context I would see little point in our suggesting specific draft changes which could hardly affect the substance of the US reply or, if they did, could scarcely be accepted by the Administration. As we have not been consulted on the content of the reply (although we have been given an informal indication of its contents), any absence of comment from us could not reasonably be interpreted as meaning that we would be satisfied to receive the kind of reply contemplated.

4. We have seen the State Department official concerned this morning and have spoken with him on the following lines:

(a) In the event that the final reply is the same as that which had been shown to us privately, we personally would not be surprised if it were regarded by the Canadian Government and public as much less than a satisfactory answer to either of the requests we had made. On the first point, concerning Sub Committee procedure, our views had been consistent, and had been made known on several occasions since 1951. The proposed reply did not indicate specifically either that our request would be met, or that the Executive branch agreed with our position (although we understand that they do in fact). On this point, the conclusion could be drawn that our long-standing requests had not been met.

On the second point concerning the exchange of security information, we regretted that the assurances we sought had not been couched in unequivocal terms, although it could be argued that such assurances were implicit in the text.

(b) The absence of any specific comments from us on the basis of this "private showing" should not be interpreted as meaning that we would be quite happy to receive a reply on the lines contemplated.

(d) In transmitting their reply they should realise that it may create a situation in which the release of the material which has been under discussion between the RCMP and the FBI would become imperative and presumably the State Department will be working actively on this problem between now and the date upon which their reply to our Note is presented.

(e) We would hope that at least 24 hours would be allowed between submission of the note (which we assumed would not bear a security classification) and its publication in order to enable us to get the text in advance to the Minister and Prime Minister wherever they may be in Canada at that time.

5. Although, as indicated above, we were anxious to avoid getting involved in commenting on (and thereby blessing) a text which had merely been shown to us, we did suggest very personally to the State Department official that:

(a) In the portion of the Note described in paragraph 4 of our telegram 1226 the assurances might be made rather more explicit. For example, after the sentence indicating that the assurances sought by us concerning material of Canadian origin are consistent with present, past and future practice, it might be well to add a sentence to the effect that the US government is therefore in a position to accede to our request for such assurances; and

(b) some provision might be made for further consultations or discussions on these matters in order to avoid the impression that the US Note constituted a final and comprehensive reply and nothing else remains to be done. We thought this might be accomplished without offending the security agencies if after the remark about a similar principle (i.e., the "third agency" principle) applying to exchange of information between Canada and the United States, a sentence were to be inserted to the effect that: as has been the practice in the past, the appropriate authorities of the two governments will continue to consult together concerning mutually satisfactory arrangements for the reciprocal exchange of security information between them.

6. The State Department official seemed willing at least to explore these two possibilities and it is just possible that one or both of them may get into the final text.

7. Our expectation is that in the circumstances, the US reply will be delivered some time during the first part of next week.

Memorandum from Minister, Embassy in United States to Ambassador in Unites States

SECRET Washington, May 27, 1957

Following your visit to Elbrick, I spoke briefly with Lister earlier this afternoon, to tell him that we attached real importance to the inclusion of some appropriate sentence in the reply referring to continuing consultation as a means of turning off the exchange of public statements in this delicate field of the exchange of security information. Lister at that time was inclined to think, in view of the attitude previously taken by the security agencies, that the incorporation of such a change in the draft now agreed might mean that the reply would be delayed until after the election.

2. Following your discussion with Mr. Léger, I telephoned him to say that the Minister had been sounded out on the views which we had expressed on a personal basis, and that his own view was that the inclusion of such a sentence providing for continuing consultation was a matter to which he attached importance. The Minister thought that this would assist the reception of the U.S. note in Canada, and would help considerably towards ending the public exchanges. I added that I thought this was true of both countries, and expressed the hope that this indication of the Minister's view would help the State Department in the preparation of a satisfactory reply.

3. I also added personally that I saw no reason why the State Department should not be able to obtain the concurrence of the security agencies on this point, which was sensible, and which it was clearly in the common interest to include. Lister expressed his appreciation for this information and hoped to have a meeting with the people concerned tomorrow.

Note du chef de la 2ième Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum by Head, Defence Liaison (2) Division

SECRET [Ottawa], May 29, 1957

Mr. Rae informed me on May 28 that he had again called on the State Department who had let him know what their reaction was to Mr. Robertson's suggestions for the revision of the U.S. reply to our note of April 10. He told me that the U.S. were impressed by the second point which Mr. Robertson made, namely, that there should be some reference to further consultation on procedures for the exchange of information and that they thought this might be worked into their reply. They were more dubious about the first. Mr. Rae told them that we attached importance to both. Mr. Rae was told that as a result the note would be revised and would have to be circulated again to interested agencies in Washington and that, in the light of this, we could not expect to receive it before the middle of June.

2. I reported this conversation to Mr. Léger on the same day. Mr. Léger thought it important that no impression should get about that the delay was due to the Canadian request for revision. He accordingly consulted the Minister who confirmed that it was his view that the note should not be held up because of our request. It must be made clear to them that it was up to them and it was their responsibility if they wished to delay the answer further. Mr. Léger conveyed this view to Mr. Robertson this morning and he was asked to make this position clear to the State Department; if they continue to hold it up, the State Department should be willing to say publicly, if requested, that they are still consulting in Washington. It should also be made clear to the State Department that it was a matter for the State Department if they wished to pursue the point which we had made. Mr. Robertson will be reporting by telegram the results of his further conversation. Mr. Robertson added that he thinks the United States Embassy in Ottawa has been advising the State Department to hold up delivery of the reply until after the election. Mr. Léger commented that this was satisfactory provided it was clear that this was the decision by the United States Government and not one which had been requested by the Canadian Government.

3. Mr. Léger suggested that I should prepare a memorandum for the Prime Minister at the end of this week giving a further report.[66]

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TOP SECRET Ottawa, January 3, 1956

Dear Mr. Robertson,

ALERTS PROCEDURES

The purpose of this letter is to bring up-to-date the information which has been sent to you on the question of alerts procedures.

2. As your know, Mr. Heeney called on the Secretary of State on April 29. His visit followed shortly after one by the United Kingdom Chargé d'Affaires. He left with Mr. Dulles an informal memorandum outlining the points in paragraph 5 of telegram No. EX-743 of April 22 to Washington, which went to you as telegram No. 664.[67] These were that there had been some preliminary discussion of the subject of alerts procedures between Mr. Pearson and representatives of the U.K. Government at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meetings; that the Canadian Government attached importance to reaching tripartite agreement on the matter; that we were aware of the U.K. working paper;[68] and that it seemed to us, from what we knew of it, that it might serve as a point of departure for further discussion on a tripartite basis.

3. Mr. Dulles raised no objection in principle, and it was left that our Embassy in Washington would have some further consultation with officers of the State Department after the question had been examined more fully by them.

4. There the matter rested, officially, until quite recently. Unofficially, we heard from a variety of sources that the tripartite proposal was being opposed by several interested agencies of the U.S. Government, in particular by some sections of the Pentagon and by the Intelligence Advisory Committee of the National Security Council.

5. Nevertheless, on November 18 the State Department called in Mr. Glazebrook and handed him an Aide-Mémoire[69] (copy attached), dated the same day, stating that "subject to certain general and specific comments, the interested United States agencies see no objection to the procedures outlined in the British Memorandum" and that "the State Department would be happy to explore further with representatives of the Canadian and British Embassies the procedures for political consultation." A similar communication was made to the British Embassy.

6. While at first sight this reply is more encouraging than we had anticipated, a preliminary examination of the Aide-Mémoire here has given rise to a number of questions on which, it seems to me, we shall have to seek clarification. Horsey of the State Department in fact anticipated this by telling Glazebrook that the Aide-Mémoire was a composite document, the meaning of which was not entirely clear even to the State Department.

[69] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 185.

7. The points which occur to us as needing clarification are as follows:

Paragraph 1 of the General Comments

We are not clear what is meant by the phrase "or that of their treaty partners." While we fully expected that the United States Government would reserve its freedom of action to exercise its right of self defence, this phrase might be taken to mean that it was free to take action involving its treaty partners without consultation. On the other hand, it may merely be an indirect reference to the wording of Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Paragraph 2 of the General Comments

The Aide-Mémoire states that the procedures outlined in the U.K. paper should be regarded as "exceptional". While we would agree that the proposed procedures are supplementary to existing NATO Alerts Procedures, as the Aide-Mémoire suggests, we think there may be some difficulty in determining the criterion whereby these special procedures would come into force, in the light of the next sentence which points out that the procedures would only take effect where "sensitive" information was involved. This may or may not present a problem but we are inclined to think we should seek further clarification.

Paragraph 4 of the General Comments

While we are not inclined to question the flow of intelligence between Washington and Ottawa, we are not satisfied that the present channels are either sufficiently clearly established or expeditious. Although we receive the United States Watch Committee Reports, we do not have direct liaison with that body or with the Indications Centre. If this paragraph means that the United States would exchange no more than current periodic Watch Committee reports, then we do not think that our principal worry is met. As you know, in a period of rising international tension we should like to receive the results of any "crash" meeting of the Watch Committee or the Intelligence Advisory Committee but I do not believe there is any assurance at the moment that we should necessarily do so. So far as speed is concerned, we believe that Ottawa requires a direct line between its J.I.C. organization and whatever central organization the United States authorities choose to nominate, whether this be the Indications Centre, or the Watch Committee or the I.A.C. We believe, therefore, that we should seek clarification as to what the United States authorities would actually do under the terms of paragraph 4, in the event of information being received in Washington which, on examination, might lead them to apprehend a state of war. It may be that the chief problem is a mechanical one but, at the moment, we are a little inclined to doubt it.

Penultimate Paragraph

You will note from the above that we doubt the validity of the second sentence. As to further discussions on the procedures for political consultation, although we are not sure what the United States authorities have in mind, we believe that, in an emergency, some procedures for more direct consultation than through Embassies might be necessary. In any event we consider that there is a requirement for the expeditious exchange of information of a kind which, if examined, might cause any of the three Governments to conclude that there was a possibility of hostilities occurring within the NATO area. The exchange of assessments based on such information is, of course, of equal importance and we are not clear whether the United States Aide-Mémoire envisages procedures between the intelligence authorities which would cover this requirement. If the U.K. authorities agree, we might re-open the intelligence problem through the U.S. invitation to discuss procedures concerning political consultation, on the grounds that political consultation can only work satisfactorily if a satisfactory system of exchanging intelligence is in being.

8. No doubt further questions will occur to you. I should be most grateful to have the U.K. comments on the Aide-Mémoire when you have had a chance to discuss it with Patrick Dean.

9. My own feeling is that we should accept the State Department offer to explore the procedures for political consultations with representatives of the Canadian and British Embassies in Washington. Presumably the stage has now been reached where the talks themselves could be tripartite.

10. The U.K. working paper is, of course, an outline of proposed U.K. procedures, and is not therefore entirely suitable in its present form for use by all three Governments. It seems to me that it would be worth exploring the desirability of adopting a general formula stating the principles for the exchange of intelligence within the context of the stated aim of the U.K. paper and for consequent consultation at all levels including between Ministers. Detailed procedures could, I think, be more easily worked out if these were related to some such general formula. The sort of formula I have in mind would be similar to that mentioned in paragraph 15 below, expanded in the NATO context.

11. Two subjects not dealt with in any detail by the working paper and Aide-Mémoire are "crash" procedures and procedures for non-NATO areas. On "crash" procedures the working paper says:

> "2. This paper sets out the stages which ought to be completed if time allowed. It is recognized that time may not be available for this and that a telescoped procedure will also have to be studied."

Concerning procedures for non-NATO areas the working paper says:

> "Major aggression by the Communist bloc is possible in other areas (than NATO) and suitable procedures would be required to meet these cases but it would be convenient to consider them separately."

And the Aide-Mémoire says:

> "5. No decision should be taken at the present time about the possible adaptation of these procedures to other areas of the world."

12. The question of "crash" procedures in connection with aggression against the NATO area would, I should think, come up at a fairly early stage. Whether or not it would be possible to lead from discussion of procedures for the NATO area to discussion of procedures for non-NATO areas is difficult to judge at present.

13. I should also like to bring you up-to-date on the question of strategic alerts in relation to the operation of our joint continental air defence system, which we raised in an exploratory way at our most recent meeting of consultation with the Americans on December 5.[70] Our approach to this question, which we are attempting to keep separate from the questions of tripartite and NATO alerts, is outlined in paragraphs 7-10 and the Annex of a memorandum for the Minister, dated November 30, of which a copy is attached.[71] The Americans present agreed that the formula attached to the Annex might serve as a useful basis for further discussions.

[71] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 303.

14. In telegram No. 2044 of December 15† (copy attached), Mr. Heeney has reported on action taken since the meeting of consultation. As you will see, our Embassy has informed the U.K. Embassy of the discussion of continental alerts, in accordance with our normal practice after a meeting of consultation, of which the State Department is fully aware.

15. We have subsequently learned that our Embassy in Washington has given a copy of our formula to the U.K. Embassy. You are therefore at liberty to give a copy of it to Dean.

16. We are most concerned to ensure that the British do not get any idea that, by raising the subject of continental alerts with the Americans, we are attempting to do an "end run" on the tripartite approach. I hope you will be able to satisfy Dean of this, pointing out to him that we have a special bilateral problem of alerts with the United States by reason of our joint air defence arrangements. At the same time, we must be careful to avoid any possibility of the Americans thinking that we are passing on to the British information which they should not have on our joint continental defence arrangements.

17. In replying to Mr. Heeney's telegram No. 2044 (in telegram No. DL-1 of December 30,† copy attached), we have agreed with the proposal that bilateral discussions should commence in Washington in the latter part of January. I do not think that the holding of these discussions before the tripartite discussions need present any difficulties. The bilateral discussions will be related to the special problems connected with the efficient operation of the continental air defence system, including the exchange of information which might lead to political consultation and the alerting of the system.

18. Could you ask Dean whom the U.K. authorities are proposing to send to the tripartite talks? Our own tentative view is that we would like to have the discussions on a J.I.C. level but clearly this will depend on whom the Americans name as their representatives. We would also assume that, if they are on the J.I.C. level, Dean himself would attend, presumably with a service representative.

19. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Heeney's suggestion that no formal reply need be made to the U.S. Aide-Mémoire until the situation is a good deal clearer than at present. I shall keep Mr. Heeney informed of your consultation with the U.K. authorities, and presume that the Foreign Office will likewise inform the U.K. Embassy in Washington.

20. We are hoping to get ahead with this question in the near future and I should be grateful to hear from you as soon as convenient.

Le ministre à l'ambassade aux États-Unis
au chef de la 2ième Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Minister, Embassy in United States, to Head, Defence Liaison (2) Division

TOP SECRET Washington, January 25, 1956

Dear Bill [Crean],

You may well have wondered at the absence of any word from us on the proposed arrangements for discussions of bilateral alerts arrangements. We have tried to ease this subject along but bearing in mind the suggestion in DL-20 of January 8† that we should not press unduly, we have not made a fuss.

2. At about the time when the telegram I have mentioned came I had a word with Outerbridge Horsey and Robert Miner. They expressed doubts as to the possibility of finding in the Pentagon a single officer who could in any way represent the Department of Defense. If, they said, they picked one from one service, the other two services would almost certainly insist on having representatives too. I found also that they were still puzzled by the meaning of our four-point formula and wanted to talk the subject over with Park Armstrong.

3. A few days ago Horsey told me that Armstrong would like to discuss this subject with me and a meeting was arranged yesterday under the aegis of Burke Elbrick (Deputy Assistant Secretary for European Affairs). Horsey was there and also, of course, Armstrong and H.E. Furnas, one of his assistants.

4. Armstrong started off by outlining the present exchange on what he called "alert type" or "indicator" intelligence. He said there were four categories:

(a) The Watch Committee Reports. Copies of comprehensive, i.e., all source, reports are made available to Ottawa through Canadian liaison officers as soon as they are printed. He added that the Watch Committee handles all indicator intelligence. It meets at least once a week or more often as required. Its staff maintains a twenty-four hour watch.

(b) The Joint Air Defence. The R.C.A.F. officers, he said, in Colorado Springs have access to intelligence. A special telephone line to Canadian Air Defence Command keeps them in touch.

(c) Alert intelligence arising from the radar screen which, of course, is jointly operated.

(d) Exchange of intelligence between NSA and CB.

5. Armstrong then asked if there were any gaps in this exchange and obviously had the impression that we were asking for a more complete exchange of intelligence or that if the exchange was complete our concern was unnecessary. I then attempted to make it clear, as I had attempted in the past, that our enquiry had nothing to do with the normal exchange of intelligence. I said that as far as we know this was entirely satisfactory. We appreciated its extent and had no desire either to criticize it or to suggest that it be more extensive. Obviously all the people at the meeting had been suffering from this misunderstanding. It had, I think, a good deal to do with the earlier confusion in the Intelligence Advisory Committee.

6. I then attempted to explain the formula, trying it backwards for the sake of variety. Turning to point (4), I said that where it was necessary for Ministers to consider alerts they must have the necessary information. That would take you back to point (3) which assumed that the intelligence authorities had the information necessary and that in turn went back to point (2). I said that it might or might not be the case that intelligence items on which the United States intelligence authorities based a recommendation for an alert were already in possession of the Canadian intelligence authorities. Even if they were — and there might be the odd immediate one not yet received — they would have to be identified and put together as a case. Moreover, it was not sufficient to draw attention to raw intelligence but to give interpretations.

7. I then laboured the point which we had discussed in the tripartite context viz., that the essence of this operation is that in a situation where a crisis is believed to exist X (being the person or organization in Washington responsible) should by some means be able to get in touch with Y (the corresponding Canadian person or group) and put his case. The case would be of little use without there being available to both X and Y the essential intelligence and there must presumably be allowed some means by which the meaning of the intelligence case can be mutually examined. I went on to suggest that leaving aside the normal exchange of intelligence, there did not exist, in our opinion, a defined arrangement by which the United States and Canadian intelligence authorities could quickly correspond on an agreed channel and, where necessary, exchange views.

8. We then begin after this exhaustive and exhausting process to get down to business. Armstrong drew attention to the distinction between the very brief warning that might arise from the radar screen and the longer one which would permit examination. I said that we were well aware of this difference and there might be occasions in which a time interval of two or three hours or even less would not allow for any discussion and that the Air Defence channel alone would have to be used. He then went on to argue that in the case of a longer warning the Watch Committee would meet and appraise the evidence. If it recommended to United States authorities that there should be an alert, this view could at the same time be passed to Ottawa "by the quickest means". I pointed out that the "quickest means" were at the moment uncertain and not necessarily quick. He was talking about "the Canadian liaison officers" by whom, I presume, he meant Uren. I said that in some cases this might work but the crisis might arise in the middle of the night or when Uren was away. Even supposing that he could be found quickly, he had no ready channel of communication, or at least not one fast enough to meet the problem. Armstrong himself added that there was also the problem of certain types of intelligence that could not be transmitted over ordinary channels.

9. The Americans by this time were beginning to see what we were talking about and I suggested that our object was not to argue in favour of any particular mechanism but to make sure that there was a mechanism which was not only approved but was workable. I personally did not believe that the existing bits of machinery could readily be put together to make the necessary whole. But the main thing was to look at the problem bearing in mind the kind of exchange which I had already indicated. It began to look as if the Americans were satisfied to use the IAC (and its creature the Watch Committee) as the authorized American end of the intelligence channel. They also became aware that the mysterious "quickest means" about which they had been talking were not readily identifiable. Armstrong then suggested that he should have a talk with Allen Dulles on the basis of the conversation and, I think, is now in a position to stop arguing about whether or not the exchange of intelligence is adequate and get down to business. Finally, I tossed out the idea that the channel should not only be authorized and defined, but probably tested in the same way that we tested the Wiser channel over a year ago, (and I was careful to remind them that the request for a testing of that channel was made by the Americans who wanted to be sure that it worked).

10. It is proposed as the next step that Armstrong will inform me that he has had his talks with the CIA and is ready to get down to business. I suggested that it would be at that stage that you should appear. However, it seems to be inevitable that the American military be left out of this and in many ways it is desirable that they should be. To bring them in would mean endless comings and goings with the Pentagon, whereas, it may be that a conversation between Park Armstrong and yourself would at least get near an agreed solution. Presumably it follows that you will not bring a service officer with you, or at least that he would not take part in the meeting. I will, of course, let you know as soon as I hear from Armstrong.

11. I am reporting on this in the form of a letter addressed to you partly because of the informality of the discussions and partly because it was virtually impossible to translate it into officialese. I gather that George Ignatieff is also involved in this subject and if he or you have any questions to ask or suggestions to make, I hope you will let me know. I think we have at least identified the bogey man lying behind the United States Aide Mémoire on the tripartite scheme and if now we can get down to earth on the bilateral plan, there may be some hope of sorting out the tripartite scheme later on.

Yours ever,

Note du chef de la 2ième Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], February 23, 1956

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE FORMULA PRESENTED BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION AT THE LAST MEETING OF CONSULTATION IN WASHINGTON CONCERNING THE EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION AND CONSULTATION BETWEEN THE TWO GOVERNMENTS ON THE SUBJECT OF ALERTS

Altogether I saw Mr. Amory of C.I.A. three times and Mr. Armstrong of the State Department twice on the above subject, although at no time did it appear that either of them had talked to each other, a factor which did not make my discussions any easier. I have recorded separately and in detail the first two discussions which I had with Armstrong and Amory on arrival in Washington. These discussions went on much the same lines as Mr. Glazebrook's previous talks and which he recorded in his personal letter to me of January 25. I am attaching the record† of these discussions in case you wish to glance at them although I do not think it is necessary.

2. On seeing Amory a second time he said that it would make the problem very much easier from the Administration's point of view if we could separate out the problem of consultation between governments from the problem of exchanging information during a period of crisis which might lead to a declaration of an Alert by either government. In addition, he said that the question of establishing an intelligence communications link between the National Indications Centre in Washington and our new Indications Room in Ottawa was one which he felt sure could be dealt with by a letter from me as Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee to Mr. Allen Dulles, as Chairman of the United States Intelligence Advisory Committee. He regarded this particular problem as one of "nuts and bolts" which should not run into difficulties of principle. I am, accordingly, attaching a draft† which I prepared and presented to Mr. Amory before I left Washington with the request that he let me know if this was the kind of letter which, in his opinion, would be acceptable to the United States intelligence authorities.

3. After further discussions with Mr. Glazebrook, we decided that perhaps it would assist our negotiations further if we prepared drafts† of separate letters dealing with the first two subjects mentioned above. These might be sent from the Canadian Ambassador on behalf of the Canadian Government to the United States Secretary of State. These, of course, only have the status of personal drafts but nonetheless I passed copies to Amory before I left Washington, stressing that they were purely personal. I asked him to pass both drafts on to Armstrong of the State Department. Mr. Amory is to let Mr. Glazebrook know his reactions to these drafts but he did volunteer the quick opinion that he could see no difficulty about the one dealing with the exchange of intelligence.

4. In the course of my last discussion with Mr. Armstrong, he supported the notion of separating these two problems because he said he thought the question of government consultation was the more difficult since he did not consider that the United States Government would be likely to bind itself under any formula which required it to consult another government before taking action itself. As you will see, it took no less than three conversations to bring Armstrong to what now seems to be the main problem.

5. I am attaching the drafts of the separate letters and would be glad to have your initial reactions to them. If they appear acceptable to you, I should suggest that they be not put to the Minister at this stage and that we should wait until we have further U.S. reactions to the drafts. If you agree, however, I shall prepare a letter to General Foulkes enclosing the drafts and copies of the record of my first two conversations. We should, I think, also send him the draft of the letter to Mr. Allen Dulles if you approve, concerning the communications link.

6. For convenience, I am attaching a copy of the "Formula" delivered by the Embassy to the State Department on December 14, 1955 following the Meeting of Consultation.

I. PROCEDURES FOR CONSULTATION ON ALERTS

1. The Minister of National Defence said that the question of procedures for alerting the North American air defence system had been under consideration for some time. In order to ensure that the government would be in a position to decide whether an Alert should be called and also be consulted by the U.S. government, some exploratory talks had been held with U.S. officials. It was understood that the U.S. authorities would be likely to view an official approach on this subject favourably at the present time. He submitted two letters which it was proposed be sent to the U.S. Secretary of State. The first was designed to ensure that both governments would have available all relevant intelligence on a situation which might lead either to declare an Alert. Only if the two were in possession of the same set of facts, and an assessment of those facts, could subsequent consultation be conducted on a realistic basis. The second letter was designed to ensure consultation over the actual question of calling the Alerts. To ensure efficient working of the indications centre of the Joint Intelligence Committee in Ottawa there was a requirement for additional facilities and two or three officers. He recommended, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the two letters be approved and that the requirement for an additional small expenditure for the Joint Intelligence Committee be noted.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Minister of National Defence and Secretary of State for External Affairs, April 16, 1956 — Document D1-56†).

2. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) One of the purposes of the proposed exchanges was to deal with false alarms from the warning lines, should they occur. Of course the main purpose was to ensure adequate consultation before a recommendation was made in either country for the calling of an Alert, which would be a most serious matter.

(b) It was impossible to determine in advance how much consultation would be sufficient before a decision was taken to call an Alert, and it was difficult to work out procedures. However, there was very little that was more important than the actual calling of an Alert and everything should be done to ensure that this step was taken only if the necessity was clearly demonstrated.

(c) The United States proposed to evacuate the principal government activities from Washington on the calling of an Alert. There were in existence now re-location sites outside of the capital for the nucleus of various government departments. The matter related to the whole governmental organization and in no way would the procedure hold up air defence activity since the Air Defence Commanders in both countries now had the necessary authority to alert their own forces in the event of warning of an attack.

3. The Committee approved the joint recommendation of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and:

(a) agreed that the two letters on procedures for consultation with the United States on Alerts, as submitted, be sent to the U.S. Secretary of State by the Canadian Ambassador in Washington; and

(b) noted that there would be a requirement for an additional small expenditure to ensure the efficient working of the indications centre of the Joint Intelligence Committee.

ALERTS

As requested in your Despatch under reference, I took the opportunity of seeing the Secretary of State on another matter this morning to hand to him copies of the letters on alerts.

2. In doing so I indicated briefly the reason for the Canadian suggestions and explained that the substance of the letters had been examined between United States and Canadian officials. Mr. Dulles did not stop to read the letters at the time, but Mr. Burke Elbrick who was present and who was familiar with the matter will ensure that my approach is followed up.

3. As requested, I am attaching copies of the letters I handed to Mr. Dulles this morning.

Dear Mr. Dulles,

Arrangements for consultation, in relation to any requirement for alerting the defences of North America, between the United States and Canadian Governments are proposed in a separate letter dated May 14, 1956. To provide a sound basis for such consultation, it is proposed that the Canadian and United States Governments agree as follows:

(1) The two Governments will keep each other informed on a timely basis when they receive information of a kind which, if examined, might cause either to conclude that there was a likelihood of hostilities occurring in which North America would likely be attacked.

(2) The receipt of such information may require rapid executive action on the part of both Governments. Accordingly, the United States and Canadian intelligence authorities as represented by the United States Intelligence Advisory Committee and the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee will pass to one another automatically and by the most expeditious means all intelligence information of the kind referred to in paragraph (1) above. They will also pass to one another all additional intelligence information, including background information which will make it possible for each intelligence authority to make assessment of the situation to which the information referred to in paragraph (1) relates. Any such assessments will also be exchanged expeditiously between the two intelligence authorities.

(3) The United States Intelligence Advisory Committee and the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee will make arrangements to ensure that such exchanges can be made by the most expeditious means possible.

I should be grateful if you would let me know at your early convenience whether these proposals meet with the approval of your Government.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Dulles,

You will be aware that in an Agreed Minute dated June 14, 1951, our two Governments agreed that frequent special consultations on mutual defence arrangements and related matters should take place in Washington "between the Canadian Ambassador and the Secretary of State and such other officers of the United States Government as may be designated by him".[72] Such meetings of consultation have taken place since then as the international situation and our mutual interests required. At the last meeting in December there was some discussion on the question of arrangements for the exchange of information and consultation which might lead to the alerting of the North American defence system and an informal paper on the subject was left with the State Department. Since that time there have been further talks with officials in Washington. As a result of these consultations, I am now requested by the Canadian Government to put certain proposals to the United States Government. These are contained in this letter and a separate letter of even date.

In my letter dated May 14, 1956, I have proposed on behalf of the Canadian Government that our two Governments agree to exchange intelligence which might lead to a conclusion that operational alert measures would be required to deal with a possible attack on North America. The Canadian Government proposes that the two Governments should agree as follows:

(1) In a situation in which either Government concludes that alert measures are necessary or desirable both in the United States and Canada, the two Governments agree to consult.

(2) Such consultation to be effective, will be conducted both through the respective Chiefs of Staff of the two countries and through the diplomatic channel. If either Government considers that more detailed arrangements for consultation become necessary, either Government is free to make further proposals.

ALERTS

Since the receipt of your despatch under reference on the subject of alerts, we have been in frequent touch with the State Department, and through the Canadian Joint Staff with the Pentagon, to expedite a reply to the two communications which I addressed to the Secretary of State on May 14 dealing with the exchange of intelligence, and with consultation in connection with bilateral alerts procedures between Canada and the United States.

2. We were called to the State Department today to receive the official replies to my letters of May 14 and I attach copies of the two letters signed by Mr. Robert Murphy, Deputy Under-Secretary, dealing with the two aspects of this problem raised in my letters to Mr. Dulles.

3. In handing us these replies, Mr. Marcelis Parsons, Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, who was accompanied by Mr. Julian Nugent, Officer in Charge of Canadian Affairs, expressed regret for the delay on the United States side in letting us have their views. Parsons was informed that these communications would be referred at once to you for study and that we would let him know if we had any further comments to make when the competent departments in Ottawa have had the opportunity of examining this correspondence.

4. I am bringing this correspondence to the attention of the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant des États-Unis à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Deputy Under Secretary of State of United States to Ambassador in United States

TOP SECRET [Washington], December 4, 1956

Dear Mr. Ambassador:

I have carefully studied your letter of May 14, 1956, in which you propose that Canada and the United States will consult when either Government concludes that alert measures are necessary or desirable in both countries. You also propose that, in such an event, this consultation will be conducted both through the respective Chiefs of Staff of the two countries and through the diplomatic channel.

I should like to state that our Government has independently been concerned with the problem of synchronization of alert measures in the face of compelling emergency, particularly in view of modern developments in warfare. The Canadian Government's parallel interest in this regard is, therefore, fully appreciated.

At the same time, it is difficult to visualize how prior consultation could be practicable under certain circumstances. The United States Government considers it essential that agreed procedures with respect to institution of alert measures, while providing for consultation and synchronization of governmental actions if time permits, be also designed to take care of circumstances in which the initiation of separate action by national authorities might necessarily have to proceed simultaneously with, or even precede, an exchange of views between governments. The latter type of circumstance must include the possibility of a failure of communications within or between nations.

By way of illustration, I should like to observe that consultation through the channels indicated by your letter is regarded entirely feasible and desirable, in the event either Government receives information which, when evaluated, might cause either to conclude that an attack on North America at some future date was likely and that institution of comparable alert measures in both countries would be desirable or necessary. We cannot imagine, however, that there would be sufficient time to consult through the channels indicated when such an attack is considered immediately probable or imminent and timely institution of emergency alert measures is of paramount importance. In such an emergency, immediacy and immanency of hostile action would have to regulate the action taken by both Governments. Under present arrangements, we must assume that (in view of the complete interchange of tactical data between the Air Defense Commands of the two countries) the decision made by both Governments would probably coincide.

It is hoped that agreement on this matter will result in arrangements that will give greater assurance of synchronization of alert actions by both governments. Meanwhile, we are constrained to rely on the probability that both Governments will, in fact, feel impelled individually to take concurrent measures, when the situation is such as to require alert measures and there is insufficient opportunity for consultation.

In the light of the foregoing, the United States Government is prepared to agree to your proposal, modified as follows:

(1) In a situation in which either Government concludes that alert measures are necessary or desirable both in the United States and Canada, the two Governments agree to consult through appropriate military and diplomatic channels if the circumstances permit. If circumstances do not permit prior consultation through both military and diplomatic channels, consultation may be accomplished through either. However, if, in the opinion of either Government, extreme circumstances require the taking of separate alert measures by it before such consultation, each Government shall be free to take such action, informing the other Government of actions taken, and the two Governments agree to consult as soon as possible.

(2) In any case, the freedom of action of either Government to take appropriate measures for its own defense or that of its other Treaty partners shall remain unaffected.

(3) If either Government considers more detailed arrangements necessary, either Government is free to make further proposals.

These arrangements will, of course, support other existing bilateral arrangements between our two governments and will supplement, not displace, agreed NATO procedures dealing with alerts and warning of attack.

If this meets with the approval of your Government, I suggest that this letter and your reply thereto should constitute our present agreement on this subject.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT MURPHY

TOP SECRET [Washington], December 4, 1956

Dear Mr. Ambassador:

I refer to your letter of May 14, 1956, containing proposals concerning intelligence consultation between the United States and Canadian Governments in the event either Government receives intelligence information that there is a likelihood of hostilities in which North America might be attacked.

The United States Government is, of course, fully aware of the necessity of close cooperation between the authorities of our two governments in connection with indicator intelligence, and agrees to the proposals set forth in your letter. Indeed, I have been informed that the United States and Canadian intelligence authorities, as represented by the Director of Central Intelligence and Chairman of the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee, have already established liaison arrangements to facilitate this kind of intelligence consultation.

I have also been informed that an agreement was recently reached between our respective intelligence authorities on a direct communications link between Washington and Ottawa for rapid handling of indications intelligence. I am sure you would agree, however, that already existing liaison arrangements are adequate to meet the continuing need for exchange of the additional and background information referred to in paragraph (2) of your proposal. Thus we should expect to transmit such information by special methods only in time of emergency or together with the information described in paragraph (1) of your proposal.

These arrangements will, of course, supplement, not displace, agreed NATO procedures dealing with the dissemination of information with respect to indications of attack, alerts and warning of attack.

Sincerely yours,

[R. MURPHY]

ALERTS

The reply to the letter on intelligence procedures is satisfactory from the point of view of the Canadian Government. Please therefore send the following letter to Mr. Dulles as soon as possible and report the date by telegram.

Letter begins:

"I refer to Mr. Murphy's letter of December 4, 1956, in reply to my letter of May 14, 1956, containing proposals concerning intelligence consultation between the United States and Canadian Governments in the event that either government receives intelligence information which might cause either to conclude that there was a likelihood of hostilities in which North America might be attacked.

I wish to confirm that my government regards these two letters as constituting an agreement between the two governments, effective on the date of Mr. Murphy's letter, i.e. December 4, 1956.

I also wish to inform you that Mr. Murphy's second letter of December 4, 1956, on consultation between our two governments, is under consideration by my government, and that I expect to communicate with you further on this subject in due course."[73] Letter ends.

2. For your information, we do not think the reply on consultation is entirely satisfactory for the following reasons: (a) it does not make consultation through the diplomatic channel mandatory as we should like; (b) it provides for consultation at the service level "through appropriate military channels", rather than "through the respective Chiefs of Staff"; (c) it refers in rather vague terms to the "circumstances" which might prevent consultation prior to the institution of alerts, whereas it would be preferable to relate any such circumstances specifically to the time factor. We think that these considerations are of sufficient importance to merit our initiating another exchange of letters in an effort to gain USA acceptance of our position. The draft of the letter which it is proposed you should send to Mr. Dulles is expected to be considered at the next meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee in a week or two.

DOCUMENT NO. D-7-57 Ottawa, January 22, 1957

PROCEDURES FOR CONSULTATION ON ALERTS

The Cabinet Defence Committee, at its 109th Meeting on April 16, 1956, agreed that two letters on procedures for consultation with the United States in connection with the possible institution of alerts by either country should be sent to the U.S. Secretary of State by the Canadian Ambassador in Washington.

2. (It will be recalled that the alerts referred to are the measures both civil and military, within their own countries, which the two Governments plan to take prior to and upon the outbreak of hostilities. If a nuclear attack on North America were anticipated and the United States Government were to declare alerts in the United States without consultation with the Canadian Government, in a situation where time permitted such consultation, an unnecessarily chaotic situation could ensue in Canada, particularly with respect to civil defence and other civilian measures affecting the public. Moreover, because of the involvement of Canada in the joint continental air defence system, Canada would automatically be implicated in any activation of the system by the United States based on intelligence received from outside the system as, for example, from the Far East. The fact that Canada could in this way be involved in a war between the United States and, say, Communist China, places this country in a special position with respect to the need for consultation with the United States in which no other country finds itself. The problem of consultation concerning indications coming from the air defence system itself, such as the crossing of the radar lines by hostile aircraft, does not arise because the Air Defence Commanders of the two countries already have authority to take in co-operation the necessary measures to deal with such indications.)

3. Copies of the two letters which were went to Mr. Dulles by Mr. Heeney on May 14, 1956, are attached as Annexes "A-1" and "B-1". Annex "A-1" is the letter on intelligence procedures, and Annex "B-1" is the letter proposing that in certain circumstances there should be consultation between the respective Chiefs of Staff of the two countries and through the diplomatic channel.

4. Mr. Heeney recently received two letters in reply from Mr. Robert Murphy, Deputy Under Secretary of State, dated December 4, 1956; copies are attached as Annexes "A-2" and "B-2".

5. The reply to the letter on intelligence procedures appears to be satisfactory from the point of view of the Canadian Government. The letter at Annex "A-3" was therefore sent by Mr. Heeney to Mr. Murphy on January 18, 1957, confirming that the exchange of letters at Annexes "A-1" and "A-2" constitutes an agreement between the U.S. and Canadian Governments, effective on the date of the second letter (December 4, 1956).

6. The reply to the letter on consultation is not entirely satisfactory for the following reasons: a) it does not make consultation through the diplomatic channel mandatory as we should like; b) it provides for consultation at the Service level "through appropriate military channels", rather than "through the respective Chiefs of Staff"; c) it refers in rather vague terms to the "circumstances" which might prevent consultation prior to the institution of alerts, whereas it would be preferable to relate any such circumstances specifically to the time factor. It would appear desirable, therefore, to obtain the agreement of the U.S. Government to some modification of the formula which it has proposed. Attached at Annex "B-3" is the text of a proposed letter which, if approved, would be sent to the U.S. Secretary of State by the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, in reply to the letter at Annex "B-2".

7. It is recommended that Cabinet Defence Committee approved the text of the letter at Annex "B-3".[74]

Projet d'une lettre de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis au secrétaire d'État des États-Unis

Draft Letter from Ambassador in United States to Secretary of State of United States

TOP SECRET Washington, January __, 1957

Dear Mr. Dulles,

I refer to Mr. Murphy's letter of December 4, 1956, concerning the proposal that Canada and the United States should consult when either Government concludes that alert measures are necessary or desirable in both countries.

2. We are sure you will agree that, because of the special relationship between Canada and the United States in the joint defence of North America, prior consultation between our two Governments is essential if at all possible. In particular, the Canadian Government wishes to ensure that indications of attack against North America originating outside the continental air defence system can be discussed and assessed fully and that there can be consultation at the highest levels between the Governments before either declares a national alert with its widespread implications involving particularly the civilian elements of our populations. However, the Canadian Government recognizes that an occasion may arise where time does not permit consultation before the declaration of an alert because the imminence of attack seems to either Government to be a matter of hours rather than days. My Government is therefore in agreement with what we understand to be the intent of the modified formula in Mr. Murphy's letter, but would prefer, to avoid any doubt in interpretation, to see it expressed as follows:

(1) In a situation in which either Government concludes that alert measures are necessary or desirable, both in the United States and Canada, the two Governments agree to consult

[74] Approuvé par le Comité du Cabinet sur la défense à sa réunion du 6 et 7 février 1957 et par le Cabinet le 14 février 1957.
Approved by the Cabinet Defence Committee at its meeting of February 6 and 7, 1957, and by Cabinet on February 14, 1957.

through the diplomatic channel and through the respective Chiefs of Staff of the two countries. Such consultation will precede the institution of alert measures by either Government except in the following extreme circumstances: If either Government considers an attack on North America to be imminent or probable in a matter of hours rather than days, consultation might, of necessity, coincide with or even follow the institution of separate alert measures by either Government. If either Government is impelled by the time factor to take alert measures before initiating consultation, it agrees immediately to inform the other Government of the action taken and to consult with the other Government as soon as possible.

(2) In any case, the freedom of action of either Government to take appropriate measures for its own defence or that of its other Treaty partners shall remain unaffected.

(3) If either Government considers more detailed arrangements necessary, either Government is free to make further proposals.

3. My Government is in agreement with Mr. Murphy's statement that these arrangements will, of course, support other existing bilateral arrangements between our two Governments and will supplement, not displace, agreed NATO procedures dealing with alerts and warning of attack.

4. If the formula set forth in sub-paragraphs (1), (2) and (3) of paragraph 2 above meets with the approval of your Government, I propose that the correspondence consisting of my letter of May 14, 1956, Mr. Murphy's letter of December 4, 1956, my present letter and your reply thereto, should constitute an agreement between our two Governments on this subject, effective on the date of your reply.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

Would you please inform Dean that we are anxious to reopen jointly with the U.S. authorities the question of reaching agreement on the exchange of intelligence relating to alerts. However we would first like confirmation from Dean of our information that US-UK relations in the intelligence field were close during the Middle East crisis despite the differences at the governmental level; secondly we think it essential initially to make an informal approach to Allen Dulles to see whether he considers the time right for further discussion. You will remember that the last official communication on the subject from the U.S. government was the State Department aide mémoire of November 18, 1955. In general the aide mémoire pointed out that intelligence arrangements were satisfactory. We think however that they might take a different view as the result of their experience in negotiating with us for a bilateral agreement.

2. Since we would be reluctant to reopen tripartite discussions without first obtaining Dulles' views we hope that Dean will see no objection to Crean sounding out Allen Dulles informally during a visit to Washington already arranged to deal with other matters during the last week in February. If Dulles were favourable we might subsequently suggest a formula along the lines of our bilateral agreement although of course the language would have to be suitably adapted.

3. Would you meanwhile tell Dean that we are working on a draft formula and will let him have it as soon as possible.

4. In passing the above information to Dean you might remind him that the U.S. authorities are not yet aware that we have given him copies of our bilateral agreement between Ottawa and Washington. We would not wish the U.S. authorities to know we have done this until a suitable opportunity appears and only then providing it would cause no embarrassment.

5. We would be content, as I understand the U.K. authorities would be, to leave over for the present the question of tripartite consultation between governments.

6. Would you also inform Dean that we hope to have an answer in the near future on the U.K. proposal to rent jointly a trans-Atlantic duplex cable circuit.

7. We understand that Dean accompanied Sandys to Washington. If this is correct, would you let us know whether he had any discussions which bear on the question of tripartite discussions on intelligence.

We saw Dean this afternoon about alerts. He stressed that he would like to get ahead with tripartite discussions with the Americans as soon as possible. He quite agrees, however, that Crean should sound out Allen Dulles informally first. We told him that you might then suggest a formula along the lines of the bilateral Canadian-American agreement, with suitable adaptations, and he thought this would be useful. He hopes, however, that the whole thing can be done fairly expeditiously.

2. Dean suggested that after you have sounded out Allen Dulles informally, Arnold Heeney and Caccia might raise the matter formally with Foster Dulles, unless you think it would be better that the approach be directly from Crean and Dean to CIA. In any case, Dean suggested that the substantive discussions could conveniently take place in Washington in March. As Dean has already told Crean in his letter of February 4,† Air Vice Marshal MacDonald, Assistant Chief of Air Staff for Intelligence, will be in Washington between March 4 and March 20 for the Annual Standing Group Intelligence Conference. Dean suggested that it would be useful if the Canadian and UK ambassadors could get things moving by then, and the follow up be done by AVM MacDonald for the UK, with Bill Crean down from Ottawa on the Canadian side. Dean confirmed that USA-UK relations in the intelligence field were close during the Middle East crisis, despite the long hiatus in consultations in formal diplomatic channels. Dean qualified this by saying that for a very short period, during the actual hostilities, the UK had not been passing all their intelligence to the Americans, "particularly on Israeli troop dispositions, etc". He also mentioned that some material from Singapore had not been exchanged during this period. But he said that very quickly thereafter the UK had got the focus back onto the Communist threat and UK-USA intelligence contacts had got back to normal. Indeed he said that the CIA had recently offered to pass to UK intelligence authorities their information on Latin America, which they had not previously done.

4. Regarding your paragraph 4, Dean promised not to let the Americans know that we have given him copies of the bilateral agreement between Ottawa and Washington.

5. Re your paragraph 7, Dean said that he had not discussed the alert question at all with the Americans during his talks in Washington when he accompanied Sandys. Some matters which would bear on the question of intelligence discussions did, however, come up during discussions with the Pentagon about the proposal for the development of missile bases in the UK, since it was recognized that this would necessarily involve working out appropriate agreements about their use. Dean had pointed out that this would, of course, also imply appropriate arrangements for the exchange of intelligence, and the Americans had agreed. Dean told us, however, that nothing was done to follow this aspect up, partly because these talks were entirely with the Pentagon and did not include CIA and partly because Dean had not yet briefed Sandys on these intelligence questions.

6. Dean confirmed the understanding, to which you referred in your paragraph 5, that he would be happy to leave over for the present the question of tripartite consultation between governments. He pointed out, however, that this question might well come up at a later stage, and referred again to the discussion about missile bases. He said that no formal agreement had yet been made for the missile bases, but he expected that the intermediate range missiles would be coming into production in the near future and their delivery, therefore, would not be unduly delayed.

7. Dean was glad to hear that we hoped to have an answer soon on the question of renting jointly a trans-Atlantic duplex cable circuit. He is, as you know, keen on this, partly because of its bearing on the alerts question. It is however, not our impression that the UK attitude on this matter has yet been threshed out with all the departments concerned or that it could yet be considered a formal UK proposal.

The Cabinet has now approved the text of the letter on consultation in reply to Mr. Murphy's letter of December 4, 1956. This is contained at Annex "B-3" of the attached Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee.

2. We thought it would be useful for you to have a copy of the Memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee since it contains copies of all the letters exchanged to date on both the intelligence and consultation aspects of this question. In addition, paragraph 2 summarizes briefly the nature of our interest in the conclusion of a satisfactory agreement on consultation and paragraph 6 mentions the points in Mr. Murphy's letter which we found to be not entirely satisfactory.

3. Would you please deliver to the State Department the reply to Mr. Murphy's letter, inform us by telegram and send us a confirmation copy through the bag. As the letter has been approved in its present form by the Cabinet, no changes should be made in it without prior consultation with us.

4. For your information we have recommended to Mr. Pearson that, in order to emphasize the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the conclusion of a satisfactory agreement with the U.S. Government on consultation on alerts, he might call in Mr. Merchant at about the same time as you deliver your letter to the State Department. We do not know whether the Minister will decide to do this but shall of course keep you informed.

5. One point which we have drawn to the Minister's attention is that the question of the integration of operational control of the continental air defence system will soon require consideration by Canadian Ministers. We have suggested to him that the United States authorities might be reminded, possibly through Mr. Merchant, that Canadian willingness to agree to joint operational control of the continental air defence forces should be met by a corresponding United States recognition of the need for adequate consultation with the Canadian authorities on matters which might lead to the alerting of the air defence system.

"Draft Formula for Exchanging Intelligence Relating to Alerts in the NATO Area between the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian Governments

1. The three governments are already exchanging a large volume of intelligence on a bilateral basis. The three governments agree, however, that where any one of them receives information which, if examined, might cause it or one of the other governments to conclude that there was a likelihood of hostilities occurring in the NATO area, in which the three countries would be involved, it will keep the others informed.

2. The receipt of such information may require rapid executive action on the part of any or all three of the governments. Therefore, the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian intelligence authorities as represented by the United States I.A.C., the United Kingdom J.I.C. and the Canadian J.I.C., will pass to one another automatically and by the most expeditious means all intelligence information of the kind referred to in paragraph 1 above. They will also pass to one another all additional intelligence information, including background information, which will make it possible for each intelligence authority to make an assessment of the situation to which the information referred to in paragraph 1 relates. Any such assessment will also be exchanged expeditiously between the three intelligence authorities.

3. The United States I.A.C., the United Kingdom J.I.C. and the Canadian J.I.C. will make arrangements to ensure that such exchanges can be made by the most expeditious means possible.

4. The foregoing arrangement in no way relieves any of the three governments from informing NATO authorities in accordance with the terms of SG 166/1, and in no way affects the requirement for the United States and United Kingdom governments to inform and consult with the Standing Group."

In accordance with the instructions in your letter under reference, I arranged yesterday at five pm to deliver to Robert Murphy, Deputy Under Secretary of State, the text of the letter addressed to Mr. Dulles, as set forth in Annex "B-3" of the memo to Cabinet Defence Committee which formed the annex to your letter of February 25. In doing so, I made the three points set forth in paragraph 6 of the memo to Cabinet.

2. I also emphasized the real importance which the Canadian Government attached to the early and satisfactory conclusion of the agreement on consultation, and took the opportunity to remind Mr. Murphy that if and when the question of joint operational control of the continental air defence forces should move forward in discussions between our two governments, we would have to give careful prior consideration to adequate consultation on the governmental level on matters which might lead to the alerting of the Air Defence System.

3. In view of the fact that I had been summoned by Mr. Dulles to an urgent meeting in connection with Mideast matters, the subsequent discussion with Murphy was carried on by Rae and Crean who accompanied me. While Murphy could not obviously give a final view, his comments indicated recognition of the need to tighten up the understanding proposed in Murphy's letter of December 4. In particular, he recognized that the expression "circumstances" in his earlier communication was vague, and he seemed to agree that the consultative process should be mandatory, except where the time factor made this impossible.

4. We also took the opportunity to emphasize the interest of the Canadian Government in ensuring that indications of attack against North America originating outside the continental air defence system should be discussed and assessed fully between the two governments at the highest level.

5. Murphy raised the question as to the precise meaning in the first sentence of subparagraph (1) of our letter of the phrase "through the respective Chiefs of Staff". He thought this might be too restrictive a phrase, and it was to avoid such a phrase that his letter had used the term "appropriate military channels". We explained carefully that the Canadian Government regarded this as too loose. There were many military channels, some of which would not be acceptable to us for consultation on matters of this importance, e.g., a channel between commands would not be acceptable. Murphy appeared to accept this point. He wondered, however, whether our phrase would require a personal communication between the respective Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff in the two countries, or whether this would not impose a limitation which might be difficult to accept in practice. We emphasized in reply that while the precise machinery by which such consultation might have to be elaborated, we attached importance to the principle that consultation, in addition to that conducted through the diplomatic channel, should at the same time be authorized at the level of the respective Chiefs of Staff.

6. Murphy undertook to communicate with Admiral Radford, and to let us have a reply as soon as possible, particularly in view of the importance of reaching finality in this matter.

Mr. Macdonnell had a conversation on this subject today with Mr. Merchant, the United States Ambassador. This took the place of the talk between the Minister and Mr. Merchant which was mentioned in paragraph 4 of our letter No. DL 206 of February 25.

2. It was made clear to the Ambassador that we wanted to emphasize the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the problem of alerts and consultation, and not to interfere in any way with the correspondence and discussions which you are conducting in Washington. Mr. Macdonnell went over the ground at some length with a view to making the point that we were proposing textual changes not from any pedantic desire for perfection in drafting but because the subject was of the greatest importance to the Canadian Government.

3. The Ambassador recognized fully the importance to Canada of consultation of the kind which we are seeking. He underlined, in terms perhaps even more explicit than those used by Mr. Macdonnell, the extreme difficulty of the situation which Canada would face should North America be attacked because of actions on the part of the United States Government in areas in which we had no direct concern. He recognized as well that the wisdom of such United States actions (for example involving Communist China) might not commend itself to the Canadian Government or Canadian public opinion and that this made consultation particularly important.

4. In the opinion of the Department this talk was generally useful in enlisting the sympathetic understanding of the Ambassador. If, as we hope, he sends an account of it to the State Department, it may do some good there.

Allen Dulles told Crean last week that he could see no reason why the present time would be unsatisfactory for resuming tripartite discussions on the exchange of intelligence relating to alerts. He would not however commit himself to an opinion on the best means of re-opening the discussions and was unwilling to give a view until he had raised the matter with the State Department. Unfortunately Crean was only told this at the end of his visit and the best he could do was to ask Dulles to let him know as soon as possible the results of conversations with the State Department. Crean suggested to Dulles that perhaps the best way of re-opening the discussions would be to have an informal tripartite talk confined to civilians, for example, Dean, Allen Dulles and himself. Such a meeting might try to identify the precise problem which concerns us and discuss the best way of putting forward a formula which would be satisfactory to the three governments. General Cabell, Dulles' Deputy, who was present at the meeting thought it would be difficult to omit the military from such a discussion. This part of the discussion was entirely inconclusive and I think we should give Allen Dulles a week or so to let us know the results of his talks with State.

2. In the light of our own experience in dealing with the bilateral negotiations we are inclined to prefer informal discussion on the civilian side only and are, therefore, dubious about Dean's suggestion that Air Vice-Marshal McDonald should deal with this during his projected visit to Washington.

3. From a discussion Crean had with General Cabell and Sheldon (in Amory's absence) it seemed clear that the CIA were very dubious about the desirability or necessity of a tripartite agreement. Cabell's argumentation ran along the following lines. The USA and UK have an agreement which works satisfactorily (I am not at all clear whether there is a written agreement). The USA and Canada now have an agreement and, therefore, there is no necessity to complete the triangle in a single document. Crean told Cabell that he still saw difficulties in not having an agreement. First, our own bilateral agreement was confined to matters affecting continental defence. Cabell rejoined that the USA did not interpret the agreement restrictively and said that surely we would be anxious to have information on any part of the world where aggression was likely to take place. Crean said that we were, of course, happy to have such information and were pleased to know that the USA did not intend to place a restrictive interpretation on our agreement. The fact remained, however, that the agreement did not read that way. Secondly, Crean pointed out that we did not always know when we received intelligence from Washington or London whether this had also been distributed to the third party. This was particularly important in relation to any reports which might be disseminated centrally by the USIAC or the UK JIC. Cabell said there would be no difficulty in waiving the third-party rule so far as intelligence produced centrally was concerned; in other words, he agreed that we should always be told in future whether a telegram or document produced centrally had been disseminated to the third party, and normally London and Ottawa would get the same information. In these circumstances, Cabell could not see what we would put into a tripartite agreement since we should be exchanging centrally between the three of us intelligence, as well as assessments, related to possible hostilities. Crean said that he did not know the precise terms of any agreement between the USA and the UK and considered that there was room for tripartite talks if for no other reason than to identify the problem which was worrying us. It might be that we would discover the problem related to mechanics rather substance but so far as we were concerned we still considered a tripartite agreement would have merit. When asked what we expected such an agreement to look like, Crean said that an agreement along the lines of the bilateral agreement with Washington, but placed in a different context, might be suitable. The UK and Canada had originally suggested that this should be in the NATO context. Cabell countered by saying why should it be confined to NATO since other areas of the world might produce intelligence related to possible Soviet aggression. While Crean conceded this point he merely reiterated that this had been the original, UK-Canadian proposal.

4. Cabell seemed unconvinced that there was need for a tripartite agreement since he considered that what we all wanted was looked after under present arrangements.

5. As a result of the foregoing we are far from clear whether a written agreement is essential. Have the UK a written agreement with the USA? We are under the impression that they do not, although they have of course a number of arrangements with CIA which could I believe hardly be classed as inter-governmental agreements. If the UK does not have a bilateral agreement, then are informal arrangements likely to work in a crisis? Certainly to press for a formal agreement on what in practice is supposed to happen now may meet with a good deal of opposition in Washington.

6. All this suggests that an early meeting with Dean would be desirable to determine exactly what we want to put to the USA and why. It is most unlikely that Crean will accompany the Prime Minister to Bermuda, and it has already been suggested to Dean that he might come on to Ottawa either during or after the Bermuda conference.

7. Would you pass a copy of this telegram to Dean and seek his comments.

ALERTS

The subject of alerts was considered this afternoon by UK ministers, who were disturbed, as Dean had been, by some of the American views expressed to Crean. They have decided to raise the question at the Bermuda meeting, and wish to warn the Americans of their desire to add the alerts question to the agenda. In this connection they would like to know if possible not later than tomorrow Wednesday afternoon London time, whether we have any comment and also whether we would agree to a tripartite meeting in Washington between Crean, Dean and Allen Dulles immediately after Bermuda that is March 28.

2. The British would also like to refer, in general terms when they raise this question with Washington tomorrow, to the conversation between Crean and General Cabell. Dean has asked whether this would embarrass Crean.

3. Dean asked Arnold Smith to pass the following message immediately to Crean. Message begins:

We are most grateful to the Department of External Affairs and Crean for giving us this info.

2. We note that Allen Dulles appears to see no objection to tripartite discussions on the exchange of intelligence relating to alerts, but we find General Cabell's views very disturbing.

3. We agree generally with what Crean said to Cabell and we think that the conversation shows how necessary it is to have a tripartite discussion on the intelligence level as soon as possible in order to elucidate exactly what the problem is and the best way of dealing with it.

4. We have the following comments. We have a standard alerts procedure dealing with indicators of Soviet intentions to attack and providing for immediate consultation with the CIA (and Canadian) representatives in London and the JIC representative in Washington. The USA IAC have approved this procedure, and this approval was notified to us by Allen Dulles in February, 1956. As Crean pointed out, however, this is not a formal agreement and is based on purely bilateral USA/UK and Canada/UK consultation; it will not provide a three-cornered exchange of information. Moreover, the procedure envisaged is relatively cumbersome, involving meetings of experts and so on. It is expressly designed to deal with a period of mounting tension only and is not intended to cover a surprise attack. We are therefore not satisfied with it and still want something much speedier and three-cornered.

5. We are surprised at Cabell's criticism that the present proposals were being confined to NATO, because the original proposal, which originated in a conversation between Foster Dulles, Pearson and Eden on December 16, 1954, dealt with the threat to the NATO area only.[75] Later we suggested that when an agreed procedure had been worked out it should be applied on a world-wide basis, but the Americans objected and wished to consider separately whether there should be an extension to non-NATO areas. We should however be content to apply any agreed procedure to non-NATO areas as well.

6. We are now very anxious to get on as fast as possible with establishing an agreed speedy three-cornered arrangement for exchanging intelligence. It is now well over two years since this exercise began, largely on the suggestion of Foster Dulles himself. If Cabell's views hold the field we shall have made virtually no progress in this time.

7. For all these reasons ministers have decided to say to the Americans at Bermuda:

(a) That although we understand why it has been difficult to press on more quickly with this exercise up to date, the time has now come to push on and bring it to a conclusion;

(b) That to this end the first step should be to reach an agreed understanding on the best methods of exchanging intelligence much more quickly and on a three-cornered basis with a view to meeting a surprise attack.

(c) That we would like to have a very early tripartite meeting for the purposes of establishing agreement on these intelligence exchanges, since there seems to be some misunderstanding, in some minds at least, as to what is intended and that we would like to arrange such a meeting immediately after Bermuda between Allen Dulles, Crean and Dean to give effect to this.

8. Ministers wish to give warning immediately to the Americans of their intention to raise this matter at Bermuda. We would like to know at once whether the Canadians have any comment and whether they would agree to a meeting as suggested above.

ALERTS

We certainly have no objection to the UK discussing with the Americans the alerts question at their talks in Bermuda. We would also agree to a tripartite meeting in Washington after the Bermuda talks as proposed in paragraph 1 of your telegram on or about March 28.

2. We have no objection to the UK mentioning the talk Crean had with Cabell on the understanding, however, that the USA are not taxed with a misunderstanding of the UK-Canadian position on the intelligence side of alerts. Would you impress on Dean that while we regard Cabell's views as possibly indicative of the American attitude we would not regard what he said to Crean as representing any final American position and we think it likely that Cabell was speaking informally and perhaps to some extent personally. It is important for our relations with Washington, therefore, that any reference to the Cabell-Crean talks should not be made in any accusatory way. We agree with Dean's comments in paragraph 4 and this confirms what we understood to be the case, namely, that the British have certain informal arrangements with the Americans which do not amount to an agreement and which in any event, are unlikely to work speedily.

3. Re your paragraph 5. We found it difficult to assess Cabell's mention of not confining the exchange of intelligence to the NATO area. His remarks on this subject we regard more as a point of debate rather than representing a fixed USA view.

4. Our only objection to paragraph 7 relates to sub-paragraph (c). We would prefer that they omit any reference to possible misunderstanding. We suggest, therefore, that the paragraph omit the clauses starting with the word "since" and ending with "intended".

ALERTS PROCEDURE

We have now received from Pat Dean the UK comments on the draft formula forwarded in your telegram under reference. These comments are contained in a top secret letter from Dean to Arnold Smith dated March 15 and reading as follows:

"We have now had an opportunity of examining in detail the draft formula which you handed to me on February 27 for exchanging intelligence in connection with our proposed tripartite alerts procedure.

2. We agree with the general line of your draft and are prepared to accept it. We think however that the following changes would be improvements:

(a) We think that the importance of really speedy exchanges of intelligence should be emphasized in the first paragraph. We therefore suggest that the second sentence of it might be amended to read: "The three governments agree however that where any one of them receives information which if examined, might cause it or one of the other governments to conclude that there was a likelihood of hostilities occurring in the NATO area, in which the three countries would be involved, it will take special steps to keep the others informed with the maximum of rapidity."

(b) The reference in the second sentence of paragraph 2 to "paragraph 1 above" is rather too comprehensive; the reference is not really to paragraph 1 as a whole but to the second sentence of it. We therefore suggest that the conclusion of the second sentence of paragraph 2 should be amended to read: "... referred to in the second sentence of paragraph 1 above."

(c) In view of General Cabell's criticism of the apparent restriction of our alerts procedure to the NATO area, we suggest that it might be advantageous to add a fifth paragraph to your formula: "5. It will be for consideration whether the above procedures should be applied to other areas in addition to the NATO area".

Procès-verbal d'une réunion

Minutes of Meeting

TOP SECRET [Washington], March 27, 1957

MEETING AT C.I.A. ON MARCH 28 TO DISCUSS THE EXCHANGE OF INTELLIGENCE RELATING TO ALERTS IN THE NATO AREA

Present:

U.S.
Mr. Allen Dulles, Mr. Wisner, General Cabell, Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Park Armstrong, Mr. Furnas.

CANADA
Mr. Crean, Mr. Rae.

U.K.
Mr. Dean, Mr. Jones, Mr. Roper.

Mr. Dean began by outlining the reasons for considering further the arrangements which had grown out of the conversation on this subject between Mr. Foster Dulles, Mr. Pearson and Sir A. Eden in December 1954. In the first place these arrangements were not on a fully tripartite basis. Secondly, they were, so far as the U.K. was concerned, embodied in a letter from Mr. Allen Dulles to Mr. Crick, which though satisfactory so far as procedure went, was not really adequate for an agreement of such importance on policy. Finally, it was important that the arrangements should cover expeditious exchanges not only of information but also of assessments. There was no suggestion that an agreed assessment should be reached but only that individual assessments should be exchanged. He therefore invited consideration of the attached draft (Appendix A).

Mr. Crean supported these arguments especially as regards the need for arrangements to be fully tripartite. Any combination of bilateral agreements tended to leave in the air the question of who was to inform the third party.

In discussion of existing procedure and methods of improving it was agreed that any new procedure would supplement, and not replace, existing arrangements such as those between the C.I.A. Watch and the Canadian J.I.C. and the U.K. J.I.C. and C.I.A. The existing Canadian/U.S. arrangements included direct line communications from C.I.A. to the Canadian J.I.C. supplemented by liaison officers in Ottawa and Washington. Mr. Dulles said it might be of assistance if Her Majesty's Government had in London a designated Indications Centre on the lines of those in Washington and Ottawa. Mr. Dean undertook to look into this.

It was then agreed that, for the purposes in question, radio communications might be unreliable when most needed. Mr. Crean expressed satisfaction with existing line communications between Ottawa and Washington which were being used for transmitting the weekly conclusions of the Watch Committee, and said that he hoped to see similarly reliable communications between Ottawa and London and Washington and London. The basis of any future procedure should be that any communication on indications intelligence addressed to one party should automatically and simultaneously be repeated to the other. It was furthermore important that intelligence should have its own channels and not have to compete in time of crisis with service traffic. Mr. Sheldon referred to the existence of a secure teleprinter line to the U.S. Embassy in London which was jointly owned by C.I.A. and the State Department and at present used largely for F.B.I.S. material. Mr. Dean said that Her Majesty's Government might consider renting a channel in the new Transatlantic cable. This would involve expenditure and for budgetary purposes an early decision would be required. It would expedite a favourable decision if, as a result of the present talks, a firm tripartite agreement were concluded. Mr. Crean mentioned that the Canadian Government might pay half the cost of an Ottawa/London link. Mr. Dean said that the first task was to reach agreement on the main principles. Thereafter technical discussions regarding procedures and communications facilities should follow.

After some discussion on the desirability of entering into a more formal agreement than that which existed in practice at the present time Mr. Dulles said that the form of agreement was largely a matter for the State Department, and invited Mr. Armstrong's views.

Mr. Armstrong said that the State Department would be breaking new ground in embodying any arrangements of the kind discussed in a formal tripartite agreement. Moreover, there was the problem presented by the exclusion of other NATO countries. The State Department would certainly wish to consider the matter from the political point of view. It would help if any documents to be exchanged were of a fairly informal nature. On a point of detail it would be more in keeping with U.S. legislation for any agreement to refer, on the U.S. side, to the Director of Central Intelligence (on whom statutory responsibility in such matters rested) rather than to the Intelligence Advisory Committee.

Mr. Dean and Mr. Crean said that it would be sufficient for any agreement to be recorded in an exchange, or combination of exchanges, of letters between the Canadian and U.K. Ambassadors and the U.S. Secretary of State.

It was left that Mr. Armstrong would consult his colleagues in the State Department urgently and get in touch with Mr. Dean and Mr. Crean as soon as possible. If there was no objection from the State Department as to the form the agreement might take, Mr. Dulles would then require to obtain the approval of the I.A.C., both as to form and substance. Mr. Dulles undertook to inform the U.K. and Canadian Embassies whether the I.A.C. had any comments to make. If the I.A.C. saw no objection the Canadian authorities would then seek Government approval. Similar action would be taken by the U.K. authorities.

Mr. Dean said that if the present agreement was concluded, the question of adopting a similar procedure for areas other than the NATO area should be considered later.

DRAFT FORMULA FOR EXCHANGING INTELLIGENCE RELATING TO ALERTS IN THE NATO AREA BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

1. The three Governments are already exchanging a large volume of intelligence on a bilateral basis. The three Governments agree, however, that where any one of them receives information which, if examined, might cause it or one of the other Governments to conclude that there was a likelihood of hostilities immediately threatening the NATO area, in which the three countries would be involved, it will take special steps to keep the others informed with the maximum of rapidity.

2. The receipt of such information may require rapid executive action on the part of any or all three of the Governments. Therefore, the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian intelligence authorities, as represented by the United States Intelligence Advisory Committee, the United Kingdom Joint Intelligence Committee and the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee, will pass to one another automatically and by the most expeditious means all intelligence information of the kind referred to in the second sentence of paragraph 1 above. They will also pass to one another all additional intelligence information, including background information, which will make it possible for each intelligence authority to make an assessment of the situation to which the information referred to in paragraph 1 relates. Any such assessment will also be exchanged expeditiously between the three intelligence authorities.

3. The United States I.A.C., the United Kingdom J.I.C. and the Canadian J.I.C. will make arrangements to ensure that such exchanges can be made by the most expeditious means possible.

4. The foregoing arrangement will supplement, and not displace, agreed NATO procedures dealing with the dissemination of information with respect to indications of attack, alerts, and warning of attack.

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], April 4, 1957

Dear General Foulkes,

TRIPARTITE ALERTS — INTELLIGENCE

I am enclosing the text of a draft letter† to the United States Secretary of State which, if finally accepted, would comprise our agreement with the United Kingdom and United States Governments on the exchange of intelligence relating to alerts in the NATO area. This draft has been approved by the United States Intelligence Advisory Committee. It appears satisfactory to me and if you and Mr. Bryce are agreeable to it, I suggest that we obtain the approval of our respective Ministers and the Prime Minister. I do not think it should be necessary to submit this draft to Cabinet Defence Committee and would be glad to know if you agree with this proposed procedure. If the Ministers and the Prime Minister agree to the text I shall then arrange with the United Kingdom Government to have identical letters sent by our respective Ambassadors in Washington to the United States Secretary of State.

The text of the letter referred to above was arrived at in the following way. I am enclosing a minute, agreed between the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives, of a meeting which was held with representatives of the Central Intelligence Agency and the State Department on March 28. Attached to this is the text of the formula which was agreed to as a working paper (with one minor change) prior to Mr. Crean visiting Bermuda and Washington. Subsequent to this meeting the State Department examined the formula with a view to determining whether there was any political objection to reaching a tripartite agreement and if there were no objection what form the agreement should take. The State Department subsequently redrafted our formula in the form of a letter to the United States Secretary of State adding the introductory sentence and the last paragraph. They also made one or two minor editorial changes. Mr. Allen Dulles then undertook to present this draft to the Intelligence Advisory Committee on April 2. This was done and I have now been informed by our Embassy that the Intelligence Advisory Committee approves of the draft letter subject to two changes in the third sentence of the second paragraph. These changes are included in the clean draft of the proposed letter which I refer to in paragraph 1 above. The changes do not to my mind alter the substance of the sentence.

I am favourably surprised by the speed and receptiveness of the United States officials to the United Kingdom/Canadian proposal and no doubt this was assisted by the fact that the President, according to Mr. Allen Dulles, directed him to review the exchange of intelligence between the United States, United Kingdom and Canada.

It occurs to me that it may be wise, once the exchange of letters has taken place with the United States Secretary of State, to exchange letters with the United Kingdom Government and so inform the United States Government. While I am not sure that this is strictly necessary it might avoid any suggestion which might arise in the future that all we have in fact done is complete two separate bilateral agreements with the United States Government. While this is unlikely to arise as I read the text of the proposed letter, it may be as well to complete the triangle in this way.

I should be glad if you would let me have your comments or agreement at your earliest convenience.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Bryce with the request for his comments.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

TRIPARTITE INTELLIGENCE AGREEMENT

My telegram No. DS-95 contains the text of identical letters to be sent by the Canadian and UK ambassadors in Washington to the USA Secretary of State. The text has been cleared with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Defence and the Prime Minister here and I understand it has now been cleared by the ministers in the UK. Would you, therefore, (a) inform the State Department that we have accepted the changes proposed by the Intelligence Advisory Committee and that identical letters will shortly be forthcoming and (b) check the text of the letter with the UK Embassy and coordinate their delivery to the State Department so that they are dated and delivered on the same day.

2. I am informing the UK High Commissioner here and our High Commissioner in London accordingly.

3. If the answers from the USA Secretary of State to the UK and Canadian ambassadors are satisfactory we expect to agree with the UK government that the latter should write to the Canadian government in the following terms:

"Following on discussions between representatives of the UK and Canadian governments in Bermuda, and subsequently in Washington the ambassadors of our two countries in the USA have addressed to the Secretary of State for the United States letters in identical terms on the subject of exchanging intelligence relating to the possibility of an attack by Soviet or satellite forces against the NATO area. Copies of the letter dated _____ from the UK Ambassador in Washington to the USA Secretary of State and his reply thereto are enclosed. I understand that the exchange of letters in identical terms between the Canadian Ambassador and the USA Secretary of State took place on the same dates.

I should be grateful for your confirmation that the exchange of identical letters between the UK and Canadian Ambassadors in Washington and the USA Secretary of State should be regarded as constituting the present agreement among the governments of the USA, the UK, and Canada on this subject."

4. Our reply to such a letter would complete the triangle with respect to the agreement and avoid any possible future misunderstanding between the three parties. We would I expect send copies of this latter exchange to the State Department.

For London Action

Would you please pass the text to Dean of the proposed exchange of letters between the UK and Canadian governments referred to in paragraph 3. Would you also inform Dean that the ministers concerned have now cleared the text of the proposed letters to the USA Secretary of State and inform him that we have now sent instructions to our Embassy in Washington. The UK High Commissioner here has been informed accordingly since he was present at the Bermuda talks. The UK High Commissioner has raised with us the question of registering the agreement under Article 102 of the United Nations Charter. Neither the USA nor ourselves would wish to register the agreement and we have so told Earnscliffe.

TRIPARTITE INTELLIGENCE AGREEMENT

Following is the text of identical letters to be sent to the USA Secretary of State by the Canadian and UK Ambassadors in Washington:

"Dear Mr. Dulles:

1. You will be aware of the conversations among representatives of our two governments and the government of (the UK) (Canada) on the subject of exchanging intelligence relating to the possibility of an attack by Soviet or satellite forces against the NATO area. The three governments are already exchanging intelligence on a bilateral basis. 2. The receipt of such information may require rapid executive action on the part of any or all three of the governments. It is proposed, therefore, that it be agreed that the USA, UK and Canadian intelligence authorities as represented by the USA Director of Central Intelligence, the UK Joint Intelligence Committee and the Canadian Joint Intelligence Committee, will pass to each other automatically and by the most expeditious means all intelligence information of the kind referred to in paragraph 1 above. They will also pass to each other such pertinent additional intelligence information, as may make it possible for each government's intelligence authority to make an assessment of the situation to which the information referred to above relates. Any such assessment will also be exchanged expeditiously among the three intelligence authorities. The USA, UK and Canadian intelligence authorities will make arrangements to ensure that such exchanges can be made by the most expeditious means possible.

3. The foregoing arrangement will supplement, not displace, agreed NATO procedures dealing with the dissemination of information with respect to indications of attack, alerts, and warning of attack.

4. I understand that the Ambassador of (Canada) (the UK) on behalf of his government is addressing an identical letter to you. I should be grateful if you will let me know at your earliest convenience whether these proposals meet with the approval of your government. If you approve, I suggest that these letters and your replies thereto should constitute the present agreement among the governments of the USA, United Kingdom and Canada on this subject. Ends."

TRIPARTITE INTELLIGENCE AGREEMENT

In accordance with the instructions in your telegrams DS-94 and DS-95, and in concert with the UK Embassy here, arrangements were made to hand to the State Department identical letters addressed to the Secretary of State, in our case on the basis of the text given in paragraphs 1 to 4 of your telegram DS-95. The letters were communicated today to Park Armstrong (Special Assistant-Intelligence). He said that replies would be drafted in the State Department and that the text of our two letters, together with the proposed State Department reply, would be submitted for approval to the Intelligence Advisory Committee. In view of the Easter weekend, he was doubtful whether this could be done before the committee's meeting on April 30.

2. Roper of the British Embassy expressed the view, with which we concurred, that it would be helpful to have an advance indication of the nature of the USA reply before it is finally communicated to us. Armstrong thought that this would be possible following consideration by the Intelligence Advisory Committee.

3. Armstrong, who did not study the notes carefully, said that he assumed that, providing they followed the lines previously agreed and incorporated the changes proposed by the Intelligence Advisory Committee, there should be no difficulty in preparing a satisfactory reply.

4. A copy of the note addressed to the Secretary of State as communicated through Armstrong is being forwarded by bag.

TRIPARTITE INTELLIGENCE AGREEMENT

Howard Furnas, in the Office of the Special Assistant-Intelligence, has given us a helpful advance indication of the likely nature of the State Department reply to our letter April 18 addressed to the Secretary of State on the subject of a Tripartite Intelligence Agreement. We understand that the Intelligence Advisory Committee has now considered this matter, and that the Office of the Special Assistant-Intelligence has recommended (the Secretary of State returns tomorrow) that replies should be sent to our letter and to the UK letter in the following terms: Text begins:

Dear Mr. Ambassador:

I refer to your letter April 18, 1957 proposing that our two governments and the government of (the UK/Canada) agree that where any one of them receives information which, if examined, might cause them to conclude that there is a likelihood of hostilities immediately threatening the NATO area, in which the three countries would be involved, it will keep the other two governments informed with a maximum of rapidity. The Ambassador of (the UK/Canada) has addressed an identical letter to the Secretary of State.

My government agrees to the proposal with the understanding that arrangements will now be made among intelligence authorities of our two governments and the government of (the UK/Canada) to insure that intelligence exchanges of the kind referred to can be made in the most expeditious manner possible. In this connection it is also our understanding that watch procedures established as a result of this agreement will be maintained on a continuous 24-hour basis.

My government agrees that the correspondence consisting of your letter April 18, 1957 and my present letter, together with the letter from the Ambassador of (the UK/Canada) and my reply to it, should constitute the agreement among our three governments on this subject, effective today. Text ends.

2. On first reading, a reply on these lines should meet the requirement, and quite properly leaves the detailed arrangements to be worked out directly between the intelligence authorities concerned. We were not, of course, asked to comment, but there seems no reason to suppose that the final reply will not follow the lines of the above draft.

3. Roper of the British Embassy has referred the proposed reply to London, and also considers that it meets the case. He understands that discussions between the intelligence authorities (or their representatives) may be proposed shortly after the final reply has been sent to us.

IV. UNITED STATES AIR FORCE REQUEST FOR PRELIMINARY SURVEYS FOR STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND TANKER BASES IN NORTHERN CANADA

11. The Minister of National Defence said that the United States Air Force had requested permission to examine a number of sites in the north with a view to establishing facilities for aerial refuelling squadrons from which the tanker aircraft would operate in support of Strategic Air Command missions originating and terminating in the U.S.

By providing such bases the bomber's range would be increased, enabling it to complete its passage to target and return and, secondly, the bomber need not be held on the ground while the slower tanker was proceeding to the refuelling rendezvous. The tanker aircraft bases at Goose Bay, Harman and Thule were insufficient to satisfy the need now contemplated.

The stated requirement was for 11 bases to be located about 1500 miles ahead of the main SAC bases in the U.S. The U.S.A.F. had already included in its 1958-59 construction programme $150 million for the initial funding of the project but it was anticipated that the whole project would cost much more than this. To save time and to avoid setting the programme back, it was desired to survey sites this summer to develop realistic costs for future planning. The programme as such would be placed before the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in due course.

The Minister recommended, with the concurrence of the Chiefs of Staff, that approval be given for these surveys without prejudice to subsequent consideration and decision by the government with regard to location and operation of the facilities and to any terms and conditions required for their control, tenure, etc.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, June 11, 1956, Document D7-56†).

12. Mr. Campney added that probably the principal reason behind the request was the fact that pressure was being put on the U.S. to leave some of their SAC bases abroad, for example, in Iceland, North Africa and Okinawa. Each base would require 9,000 foot runways and would be capable of handling 40 tankers in two squadrons.

13. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) SAC's need for tanker bases would not be so great once it was completely equipped with B52 bombers. However, this would not happen for a few years yet and meanwhile SAC would have to continue to operate with B47's. While the request involved 11 bases there was a good possibility that this number might be reduced. Any bases that were developed for this purpose might have some residual value when they were no longer required, as would be the case when the intercontinental ballistic missile was in operation.

(b) Refusing the request would probably lead to considerable difficulties with the U.S. authorities. Although SAC had not been assigned to NATO, its deterrent effect was the most important single element in the defences of the organization. It had been clearly implied in the past that one of Canada's roles in NATO was to support the strategic bombing effort of the U.S.

(c) Some of the bases in which the U.S.A.F. had shown interest included Namao, Churchill, Coral Harbour and others, depending on their distance from the main bases in the U.S. If the programme were ultimately refused, the Russian position would be much improved in that Russian defences could then be concentrated against attacks which could only come from certain directions whereas now the Russian defensive problem was a very difficult one because of the existing U.S. bases spread pretty well around the world. Another problem to be kept in mind was the fact that the Russians had overtaken the U.S. in the development of long-range bombers. These increased tanker facilities would help to strengthen U.S. effort in the field.

(d) If tanker facilities were established in Canada it would not be long before requests were made for bomber bases themselves. It was stated, on the other hand, that no nuclear bombs could be removed from the U.S. without Presidential approval, hence the chance of requests which would involve the storing of these weapons in Canada would appear to be unlikely. Furthermore, they would probably be able to operate more efficiently from existing bases in the U.S. with refuelling taking place over Canada.

(e) Agreeing to the request meant approval ultimately of the stationing of thousands of U.S. personnel at various bases in Canada and the present was not the time to embark on such a course. It was said, on the other hand, that a decision to permit the surveys would not imply approval at this stage of the overall project. The need for such bases was difficult to dispute and a decision to refuse the request would be a very serious one.

(f) SAC bases would continue to be located in Iceland and North Africa for some time, although there were fairly clear signs that they might have to be removed in the future. The proposal for bases in Canada was an attempt to visualize the situation some years ahead.

(g) In large measure war had been avoided because the Russians now thought that if they attacked there would be prompt retaliation by U.S. bombing forces. U.S. authorities were concerned with the possibility of interference with the maximum effectiveness of the deterrent. If SAC were forced to withdraw from some of its existing bases closer to the U.S.S.R., the U.S. authorities would want it known publicly that compensating arrangements were being made to maintain the effectiveness of the deterrent. It seemed necessary to make a choice between maintaining the effectiveness of the deterrent and a serious domestic political problem arising from a large increase in U.S. facilities and personnel in Canada. There would be serious consequences if Canada contributed to a lessening of the free world's strength.

(h) The problem might be dealt with at the moment, though it would only mean postponing decisions until later, by confining the surveys to existing airfields and by having them made a Canadian undertaking in cooperation with U.S.A.F. officers concerned. This possibility might be discussed between service authorities of the two countries and the reaction of the U.S. obtained.

14. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the request of the United States Air Force to examine potential sites for aerial refuelling bases and agreed to recommend that the U.S. authorities be informed:

(a) that Canada would be prepared to investigate, in cooperation with the appropriate U.S.A.F. officers, what existing airfields might be made suitable for this purpose; and

(b) that it would be undesirable to proceed with any preliminary arrangements for new airfields and related facilities until after the investigation in (a) above had been completed and a report made thereon.

II. U.S. AIR FORCE REQUEST FOR TANKER BASE FACILITIES IN CANADA
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JUNE 13, 1956)

3. The Minister of National Defence said that the investigations of the bases for aerial refuelling had been made and the requirements estimated. The U.S. had now indicated that they wished to consider development of only nine locations. In order of priority, these were at Frobisher Bay, Churchill, Cold Lake, Namao, Coral Harbour, Knob Lake (old site), Great Whale River, The Pas, and Fort Chimo.

For financial reasons development of the first four only was considered possible by the U.S.A.F. in the immediate future, and authority to expend $40 million for this purpose was being sought. However, the U.S.A.F. considered it desirable to undertake engineering studies of the remaining five to prepare realistic construction estimates. Meanwhile, subject to the approval of Canada and the availability of funds, it was proposed to construct facilities at the first four during the forthcoming summer season.

The work considered to be necessary would consist of reinforcing and extending one runway at each site up to 10,000 feet in length and providing fuel storage, parking space, taxiways, etc. nearby. Communications and navigational aids would also have to be augmented to meet U.S.A.F. operational requirements. Each base would be prepared to handle 40 tanker aircraft on occasions. One full-scale exercise employing this number would be held each year on each base and, in addition, six tankers would be staged through such bases once or twice yearly to rotate the fuel. Refuelling exercises in Canada would be cleared in advance and scheduled at mutually satisfactory periods. All training manoeuvres would be conducted in accordance with Canadian regulations and Overflight Agreements. A small holding detachment composed of servicemen and civilians would be required at each location continuously. During exercise periods, permanent detachments would be augmented by a mobile support unit of 310 ground crew and 280 flying personnel. Little, if any, additional living accommodation would be required at the four bases presently considered.

The Chiefs of Staff had concluded that the provision of these facilities would considerably increase the effectiveness of the U.S. Strategic Air Force and that, since the support of SAC was one of the main Canadian responsibilities to NATO, the requests should be met. The requirement was a limited one in time and was expected to cover the period until longer range bombers were available. Ultimately the development of these bases would provide useful facilities for the development of northern Canada.

4. The Minister recommended that the establishment of four tanker bases at Frobisher, Churchill, Cold Lake and Namao be approved and that the U.S.A.F. be authorized to conduct detailed studies for the expansion of facilities, if required, at the remaining five airfields at Coral Harbour, Knob Lake, Great Whale River, The Pas and Fort Chimo. The terms and conditions, including requirements of Canadian procurement and construction, etc., would, if the programme were authorized, be subsequently negotiated with the U.S. government and agreed to by an exchange of notes.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

5. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) When the proposal had been previously considered, it had been thought desirable to have these bases established as far away from the main centres of population as possible. Namao was relatively close to Edmonton, and in the circumstances it would be helpful if this particular base could be dropped from the list. Cold Lake was quite close to it and would likely serve the needs envisaged for both it and Namao. It was pointed out, on the other hand, that the committee had decided originally that so far as possible these facilities should be established only at existing R.C.A.F. or other government airfields. Namao was one of these. In addition, to mount an attack as quickly as possible, it was necessary to limit the number of tankers to 40 per base; otherwise, the total number required would take too long to get into the air.

(b) It would be desirable to make a condition of meeting the request that procurement and construction would be undertaken through Canadian departments and agencies employing Canadian contractors and not leave this to be the subject of later negotiation.

(c) The proposal involved no cost to Canada and contributed materially to the effectiveness of SAC. It was difficult, therefore, not to agree to it. However, it would mean that Canada was becoming still more closely associated with what the Russians regarded as the greatest threat to their security. There was increasing evidence that the Russians were coming to the conclusion that the U.S. would not start a war. Even so, the danger of "brush fire" wars had if anything increased, and the line between one of them and a full-scale war was becoming more shadowy.

(d) The U.S. was anxious to effect greater integration with Canada in fields such as this and in operational control, for example, but did not appear able to extend integration into the field of defence production. Canada should press the U.S. authorities to adopt equipment we produced.

(e) Because of financial considerations, there was some doubt that the U.S. would decide to develop facilities at the remaining five of the airfields mentioned. However, they did feel that detailed studies would be helpful at this stage. In this connection, the taking of provincial crown lands, if any were necessary, without consultation with provincial authorities, should be avoided. In most of the five cases, the necessary land was available, but steps should be taken to avoid unfortunate incidents with any province in the event that more was needed.

6. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on the status of the request of the United States Air Force for tanker base facilities in Canada, and agreed to recommend:

(a) that the United States Air Force be authorized to establish, for occasional use, four such bases at the R.C.A.F. airfields at Frobisher, Churchill, Cold Lake and Namao, on the understanding that procurement and construction would be undertaken through Canadian Government departments and agencies employing Canadian contractors; and

(b) that, in conjunction with the R.C.A.F., the United States Air Force be authorized to conduct detailed engineering studies for the possible expansion of facilities at the five airfields at Coral Harbour, Knob Lake (old site), Great Whale River, The Pas and Fort Chimo, on the understanding that no provincial crown lands would be taken for the purpose indicated without prior consultation, as appropriate, with the provincial authorities concerned.

D.E.W. LINE; RE-SUPPLY OF WESTERN ARCTIC

10. The Minister of Transport recalled that in the arrangements made with the United States on the establishment of the D.E.W. Line, it had been stipulated that Canadian commercial carriers would be given every possible opportunity to participate in the movement of materials, equipment, etc. during the construction phase. It was understood that the same situation would apply during the operational period.

Through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, Canada had been requested to consider the maximum development of the Mackenzie River route for the distribution of supplies as

Farley informed by telephone 3/6/57 [F. Tovell] far to the east and to the west of the river as practicable. The object was to avoid the necessity of a convoy around Point Barrow — a very dangerous operation performed by the U.S. in 1955 at high cost. As a result, a plan had been worked out and discussed with the U.S. authorities involving the supply by Canadian agencies of all western Canadian Arctic sites and most eastern Alaskan ones. Commencing in 1957, it was proposed that approximately 5 million gallons of petroleum products and dry cargo for 2 Alaskan and 25 Canadian sites be carried by Canadian commercial operators, and that the barge movement down the Mackenzie River carried out by the Northern Transportation Company would be extended. In addition, it was proposed that a number of stations would be serviced by five U.S.-owned vessels to be entrusted to a Canadian commercial company.

U.S. officials concerned had subsequently suggested that the Canadian government assume logistic responsibility for re-supplying these D.E.W. sites because it would be illegal for the U.S. government to transfer government-owned vessels to a foreign private company. Since this type of ship could only be obtained in the U.S., the alternative would be to have the transportation undertaken by the U.S. government, but this would make that government the major provider of sea transportation in the Canadian western Arctic. In the circumstances, it had been concluded that Canada should assume the responsibility for this sea supply operation.

The Minister recommended at the suggestion of the Advisory Committee on Northern Development, that Canada undertake the development of the western Arctic sea supply to the D.E.W. Line bases from Barter Island eastward by way of the Mackenzie River route, on a reimbursable basis, with five special ships required being provided from U.S. sources. It was also proposed that the Northern Transportation Company be designated the agency responsible for the work.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 10, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 5-56†)

11. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The proposal was a sensible one in that Canadian organizations and personnel would be working on Canadian territory, and, at the same time, relieving the U.S. of a task which it did not wish to undertake. It would be a better arrangement still from some points of view if Canada were to bear the cost of the operation.

(b) It was unfortunate that more and more U.S. forces were being stationed at bases on Canadian soil. However, there was no alternative to this trend unless Canada undertook the responsibility for manning and operating all joint defence projects on Canadian territory. From this point of view the proposal was about as good as could be expected.

(c) Relations between some private transportation companies on the Mackenzie River and the Northern Transportation Company could be improved. It was thought by some that the latter maintained high rates in an effort to keep these private firms in business. It would be helpful if they could have a share of the work of re-supplying the D.E.W. Line stations.

12. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of Transport and agreed,

(a) that the United States be informed that Canada would be prepared to assume responsibility for development and organization of western Arctic sea supply to the D.E.W. Line from Barter Island eastward by way of the Mackenzie River route on the understanding,

(i) that certain necessary vessels for the lateral movement suitable converted be provided from U.S. sources;

(ii) that Canada would be re-imbursed by the United States for the costs incurred in the supply of the D.E.W. Line stations;

(iii) that the supply of the D.E.W. Line stations would be integrated, on a basis to be agreed, with the supply of settlements and general civil carriage along the Canadian portion of the coast; and,

(b) that the Northern Transportation Company be designated as the Canadian agency for planning and organization of the undertaking on the understanding that, in the operation of the larger vessels required for the lateral movement from the mouth of the Mackenzie River, the greatest practicable use would be made of Canadian commercial carriers with experience in the Arctic.

LETTER C-130 Ottawa, February 7, 1956

DEW LINE

A completely unauthorized operation in Canadian territory by Alaska Freight Lines, Inc., to carry freight to DEW Line, has been a matter of concern to Ministers. The attached copy of a letter of January 25† from Mr. Lesage to Mr. Pearson gives the essential facts. Briefly, Alaska Freight Lines have — without making any attempt to secure the necessary authorization — brought men, equipment and fuel from Alaska to Norman Wells. It is their intention to construct several hundred miles of winter road in order to make deliveries to DEW Line sites as far east as Boothia Peninsula.

2. An inter-departmental meeting chaired by the Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs was held on January 30 with representatives of Western Electric and Alaska Freight Lines, who were told in forthright terms that their failure to give advance information as to the operation they proposed to conduct and the route they wished to follow, as well as their apparent failure to comply with federal and territorial laws and regulations (e.g., customs, immigration, territorial fuel taxes, firearms, and welfare of Indians and Eskimos) could not be accepted. The Canadian officials who spoke made it clear that this ignoring of the boundary could, if used by critics of Canadian-United States co-operation, develop into an incident of some magnitude. The Canadian Government, they were told, is anxious to extend all possible help in connection with the DEW Line but the law must be observed.

3. The attitude of the officials of Western Electric and Alaska Freight Lines was one of fairly abject apology. They claimed that they had no intention of ignoring the Canadian Government or of not complying with Canadian law and the only explanation they could offer was that Alaska Freight Lines had assumed that in some unexplained manner someone else had cleared this operation with the Canadian Government. They undertook to leave officials in Ottawa to provide the information required by government departments, and this has been helpful in clearing up misunderstandings and regularizing the activities of the company.

4. Since the meeting it has been ascertained that Alaska Freight Lines did apply for a Northwest Territories business licence in October and, in connection with it, had to establish satisfactory compliance with the Workmen's Compensation Ordinance. They have had a Yukon business licence for some years and for that too have to demonstrate compliance on workmen's compensation. They had thus qualified to do business in Canada, and to this extent paragraphs seven and eight of Mr. Lesage's letter might be modified slightly, and also paragraph nine. However, the licences were routine and general, and did not bring up the question of the particular operation it was proposed to conduct.

5. You are instructed to bring this matter orally to the attention of the State Department with a view to making clear the serious concern felt by Ministers. Had authority been sought in advance it would have been granted, due care being taken to see that Alaska Freight Lines made suitable arrangements to comply with applicable laws and regulations. The objection is not to the movement of freight this season by Alaska Freight Lines but to their failure to give adequate recognition to the existence of Canadian law. As things developed, it was necessary to tell Alaska Freight Lines to stop their operations while their activities up to that time were examined and, so far as possible, regularized. This was done as a matter of urgency and the government departments concerned made every effort to straighten out the tangle quickly. Sufficient progress had been made that the Minister of Northern Affairs stated on February 2 that he felt authority could be given to continue operations. There is every recognition here of the importance of supplying the DEW Line. However the State Department will appreciate, we believe, that an incident of this sort is not only an embarrassment in itself but could, if exploited, become an irritant in Canada-United States relations out of all proportion to its size.

[Ottawa], March 26, 1956

My dear Colleague:

This letter, which I am afraid is rather lengthy, deals with a problem that has arisen regarding the sea supply of the DEW Line in the western Arctic once the construction phase has ended and the line becomes operational in 1957.

Late last year the United States, which foresees great difficulty in the matter of sea supply from Seattle around Point Barrow, Alaska, because of difficult weather and ice conditions and the long route, asked if the Canadian authorities could devise an alternative system of supply, possibly based upon the MacKenzie River. We felt that this approach was in conformity with the agreement between Canada and the United States regarding use of Canadian materials and transportation agencies wherever feasible.

As a result of this request, my officials, in conjunction with other departments and in particular with the assistance of Northern Transportation Company and Imperial Oil Company, made a very exhaustive study of the whole problem and submitted a plan based upon development of the MacKenzie River water route for transportation of supplies and their distribution from the mouth of the MacKenzie River by lateral movement to the western Arctic DEW Line sites. Most of the fuel oil would have been provided directly from Norman Wells with limited additional amounts coming from Edmonton. Northern Transportation Company would have stepped up its activities on the MacKenzie River and would have constructed oil storage facilities at the mouth of the river for trans-shipment purposes. My own Department has already initiated a programme for increasing aids to navigation on the river for this purpose and the Department of Public Works is planning the construction of a wharf at the mouth of the MacKenzie as well.

In principle the idea seemed to be acceptable to the United States, which was in addition however requested to provide certain shallow draft tankers and dry-cargo vessels for use from the mouth of the MacKenzie laterally to the western Arctic DEW Line sites, since their naval reserve was the only source where vessels of this sort were readily and quickly available. Northern Transportation Company was to act as the overall co-ordinator and they agreed to undertake the operation on the basis of cost plus ten percent, as I understand it.

My Deputy Minister has received recently a letter† from the United States military member on the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, indicating that they are not satisfied with this proposal and wish to defer implementation of any scheme of this sort until at least 1958 (the second year after the DEW Line becomes operational); and that they have some reservations on the economics of our proposal, suggesting that it might be more costly to them than use of their own military naval forces for movement around Alaska. This letter has caused our Department, and I believe a number of other departments who are keenly interested in the development of the MacKenzie River project, considerable concern. To begin with, it does not contain any detail as to the economic difficulties the United States foresees, and we find it hard to believe that on a fully allocated cost basis, our scheme could be more expensive than sea convoy from Seattle around Alaska, — although it might be in terms of direct out-of-pocket expenditures if the United States was relying on using naval forces for this purpose.

It is the case also that if the sea convoy is used in the first year of regular operation of the DEW Line, it might be very difficult to return to the project of the MacKenzie River route the following year. On the other hand, it might also be the case that the United States could not supply the necessary shallow draft tankers for the Arctic lateral movement in time for this year's operation, since they would have to be moved in this year and wintered in for use in 1957. There is, however, no indication that this is the reason for their request for delay.

Quite apart from this, we have the feeling that the line of argument advanced by the United States communication appeared to disregard the general principles which we thought had been agreed as applicable in the operational phase of the DEW Line just as in the construction phase, namely, use of Canadian materials and Canadian supply agencies wherever feasible. The plan we advanced was based upon use of Canadian fuel oil and gasoline and the use of Canadian transportation agencies. The United States suggestion of convoy out of Seattle, while the only feasible method during the construction phase, certainly does not involve any Canadian materials or transportation agencies.

It has occurred to me that on the forthcoming trip which you are making along with Mr. Campney and Mr. Pearson, as well as senior United States governmental representatives, to some of the DEW Line sites, you might find an opportunity to take this matter up, since I believe it is one of considerable importance to Canada. If you agree, we should take the line that we feel quite strongly that the MacKenzie River route plan should be put into effect in the general interests of Canada and in accordance with the spirit of our understanding regarding the operation of the DEW Line.

Sincerely yours,

[G.C. MARLER]

II. U.S.A.F. D.E.W. LINE LOGISTIC PLAN

19. Mr. Loughead reported that on April 3 a meeting had been held in the office of the Deputy Minister of National Defence to discuss the latest version of the U.S.A.F. Logistics Plan. Two aspects of the plan — procurement and transportation — had seemed unsatisfactory from the Canadian point of view. The plan indicated that the south-north movement of supplies by both sea and air would take place on the eastern and western extremities of the line through established U.S.A.F. channels. It did not mention the possibility of using the MacKenzie River system, of using Canadian airfields other than Frobisher, or of Canadian participation in the sea supply of the eastern part of the line except in Foxe Basin. The plan for procurement of supplies was to employ U.S.A.F. channels, which presumably would exclude any significant Canadian participation. A meeting had been arranged between the Department of Defence Production and the U.S.A.F. to discuss procurement; the Department of Transport was re-examining the cost of using the MacKenzie River system and would then discuss the transportation plan with the U.S.A.F. The Department of National Defence had passed to the United States various editorial comments made by Canadian departments while making it clear that the Plan had not yet been approved in principle.

(Secretary's memorandum Document ND-169 dated April 12, 1956†).

20. Mr. Robertson reported that Mr. Howe and Mr. Lesage had discussed the use of the MacKenzie River system with Mr. Wilson and Mr. Quarles during their recent D.E.W. line tour. As a result the U.S.A.F. had been instructed to re-examine the matter, and Canada had agreed to see if costs for oil at Norman Wells and for distribution to sites could be reduced. When this information had been assembled a meeting would be held between U.S. officials and representatives of interested Canadian departments.

21. Mr. Golden reported that Mr. Ruck of the Department of Defence Production would be discussing the procurement problems with U.S. officials on 18 April.

22. Mr. Baldwin said the Department of Transport had written to the U.S.A.F. asking for more information about the plans for transportation, and particularly about the basis on which the cost of sea supply to the Western Arctic round Alaska had been calculated.

23. Mr. Macdonnell expressed concern at the postal arrangements indicated in the Logistics Plan. These would result in mail to and from the D.E.W. line being routed through U.S. Army post offices in the United States. The Department of External Affairs considered this undesirable and had requested the Department of National Defence to re-examine these arrangements with the U.S.A.F.

24. Mr. Loughead reported that the Department of National Defence had informed the U.S.A.F. that the arrangements for postal services would have to be reconsidered in consultation with the Canadian Postal Service.

25. The Committee noted the report on the proposed U.S.A.F. Logistics Plan for the D.E.W. line.

RE-SUPPLY OF THE D.E.W. LINE

On 17th May a meeting was held between Major-General J.B. Doyle, Director of Transportation, HQ. USAF, other U.S. officers concerned with the logistic support of the D.E.W. line, and representatives of Canadian government agencies with responsibilities relating to northern development. The meeting was chaired by the Deputy Minister of Transport, and had been called to discuss sea and air transportation in the operating phase of the Distant Early Warning line. The three main subjects considered were:

(a) the use of the Mackenzie River route;

(b) sea supply to the Eastern Arctic;

(c) air supply.

The cost figures for supply by sea through Bering Strait and for the Mackenzie River route, which had been forwarded to Canada in a letter dated 26th April from the United States Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, were reviewed. The meeting agreed that the figures for the two routes were not on a common basis and therefore not comparable. After detailed examination had shown that the differences in cost between the two routes would not be as great as the figures had indicated, the U.S. representatives, though expressing some concern at the procurement cost, announced their intention of recommending the use of the Mackenzie River system for the supply of the Distant Early Warning line sites in the western Canadian Arctic, subject to annual review. It was agreed that a letter would be sent to the United States through P.J.B.D. channels, containing revised figures, on which formal agreement on the use of the Mackenzie River route could be based.

The Canadian interest in undertaking the annual sea supply of both the Foxe Basin and Baffin Island elements in the Eastern Arctic was discussed. The U.S. representatives stated that they would like this to be undertaken so far as possible by Canadian shipping. The advantages which might be gained by integrating supply operations in the Canadian north under Canadian control were discussed. It was agreed that the United States would provide information on the quantity and types of shipping that they recommended, and that the Department of Transport would determine how far these might be met from Canadian sources.

In the logistics plan it had been made clear that the lateral air supply would be carried out by Canadian commercial operators but there had been some doubt as to the meaning of the paragraphs relating to periodic and annual air supply. The U.S. representatives explained that annual supply was an extension of the annual sealift to carry by air the annual supply to those sites which could not be reached by sea. There were seven such sites, five of which would probably be served by air from Hall Lake and the other two from Frobisher. It was indicated that this air movement would be phased over a long period rather than concentrated immediately after the sea supply. Most of the tonnage would be diesel fuel, and tanker aircraft might be necessary. With reference to periodic air supply, the U.S. representatives explained that their technical supply procedures made it essential that technical equipment for the line be supplied from Alaskan Air Command and North-east Air Command depots at Ladd Field and either Frobisher, Goose Bay, or Fort Pepperrell respectively. For this reason the periodic supply would need to include regular flights to the main stations from these depots. However, a large part of the periodic supply would consist of food and other non-technical items which would come from the south and might possibly be procured in Canada, while most of the personnel manning the line would be recruited in Canada. It appeared likely therefore that the contractor would need to establish regular flights from the airfields in southern Canada to the main stations, and the U.S.A.F. would examine this with the intention of adopting it as part of the transportation pattern if it were practicable. The representative of the Air Transport Board offered the complete co-operation of the Board, mentioned the possibility of establishing Class II scheduled services, and pointed out the value of regular north-south services in maintaining the air operators who would be engaged in the lateral communications.

OPERATION OF THE DISTANT EARLY WARNING SYSTEM IN CANADA

1. It will be recalled that at a meeting of the Cabinet on 6 July, 1955,[82] it was agreed that there would be no objection to the United States manning and operating the portion of the Distant Early Warning Line in Canada for the first three years of its operation, on the understanding that, within that period, Canadian wishes regarding its future participation in manning and operation of the Line would be made known. As the Distant Early Warning Line will go into operation in 1957, this three-year period will extend from 1957 to 1960.

[82] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 333.

2. At the 111th meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee held 13 August 1956, the committee reviewed a statement in the July 1956 Journal of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence as follows: "It was urged that Canadian authorities be encouraged to reach a decision at the earliest possible time as to the date when they wished to assume responsibility for the continuing operation of the Distant Early Warning Line in Canada". The question was discussed briefly and then deferred to a later meeting.

3. Three considerations may have prompted the United States to take this position at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence:

(a) to re-emphasize that they are not undertaking this task in Canada by preference and that they would be very happy to have Canada undertake it for them;

(b) the need to develop long-term plans and programmes and for the completion of contractual arrangements with its civilian operating agents. Since these plans must take account of the Canadian Government's wishes respecting participation in the manning and operation of the Distant Early Warning Line after 1960, the United States Air Force feels that an early decision by the Canadian Government would be desirable; and

(c) the annual operating costs, exclusive of service personnel costs, is estimated to be approximately $53 million. The United States Air Force has other extremely expensive programmes for which they are endeavouring to find funds, such as the Strategical Air Command base expansion programme ($600 million), Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles, Semi-Automatic Ground Environment and Distant Early Warning Line extensions, and they may hope that Canada will accept a higher proportion of air defence costs in Canada than in the past.

4. The first warning of attack may come from that portion of the Distant Early Warning Line in Canada. In any alarm system there is always a possibility of a false alarm. When the alarm is sounded, true or false, it could initiate the evacuation of many major United States cities and the launching of the Strategic Air Command retaliatory forces. This burden of responsibility for sounding the first alarm is a heavy one for Canada to carry.

5. The Distant Early Warning system consists of four separate command elements, comprising the Pacific seaward extension, the Alaskan segment, the Northeast segment and the Atlantic seaward extension. For greater operational efficiency, it is considered wise to have one nation responsible for the manning and operation of the entire system.

6. Canada is now making a substantial contribution to the continental defence system. By joint agreement the RCAF is manning and operating 17 of the 33 radar stations in the Pinetree System and, commencing in 1957, it will be responsible for the operation of the Mid-Canada Line. At present the RCAF is employing 3820 service personnel and 1129 civilians on the Pinetree chain, and will employ 86 service and 878 civilian personnel on the Mid-Canada Line, plus 260 on back-up. If Canada is to carry a greater share of the burden of continental air defence there are other areas such as in the expanding ground environment in the populated areas of the country where this contribution might be better made.

7. It is estimated that 600 civilian technicians and 24 service personnel will be required to man and operate the Canadian portion of the Distant Early Warning Line. The annual operating costs will approximate $53 million. The United States Air Force estimate that this amount may increase by as much as 25 per cent when more detailed data becomes available. Any future capital requirements cannot be forecast at the present time. It is probable that there may be a requirement to improve the detection equipment, for which no estimate of costs is at present available.

Recommendations

8. It is recommended that in view of the additional costs which would have to be borne by Canada, and the implications arising out of the factors referred to above, Canada should indicate to the United States her agreement to the manning and operation by the United States of the Distant Early Warning Line for an additional three-year period beyond the initial three-year period on the same basis as has been previously agreed to. Prior to the conclusion of this additional period, the wishes of the Canadian Government concerning participation in the manning and operation of the system will be made known.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

MANNING AND OPERATION OF THE DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

As a result of a submission made by the Minister of National Defence the Cabinet Defence Committee, you will recall, took certain decisions at its meeting on December 19, 1956 concerning the operation and manning in the period 1960-1963 of that portion of the Distant Early Warning Line in Canada. It was decided as well that Cabinet Defence Committee's decisions should be made known to the United States authorities at the next meeting of the PJBD.

2. There is attached a draft of a statement which might be made by the Chairman of the Canadian Section, PJBD, at the January meeting. The draft attempts to convey the general sense of the discussion which took place at Cabinet Defence Committee's meeting.

3. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, who has seen the attached draft has suggested that the last sentence of paragraph 3 be deleted. He believes the sentence might give rise to speculation and result in embarrassing enquiries from the United States authorities as to what other activities we had in mind. The Chairman of the Canadian Section, PJBD, is inclined to share the views of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff. Officials in this Department, however, tend to see merit in leaving this sentence in the statement. We are unwilling to take over the manning and operation of a part of the DEW Line. We would not, however, wish the United States Government to get the impression that we are attempting to shirk our responsibilities in continental air defence. It is precisely because we do believe that there may be other more effective contributions which we can make to continental defence that we are prepared, for the moment at least, to allow the United States to operate and maintain that sizeable portion of the DEW Line which is on Canadian territory.

4. I should be grateful if you could indicate whether you believe that this sentence, or some sentence expressing a similar thought, should be included in the proposed statement.[83]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], January 8, 1957

POSSIBLE STATEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CANADIAN SECTION, PJBD

1. I should like to refer to an aspect of the operation of the Distant Early Warning Line which has been discussed from time to time in the Board, the question of future Canadian participation. This question was most recently discussed at the meeting held in July 1956 and the Journal includes the following statement:

> "It was urged that Canadian authorities be encouraged to reach a decision at the earliest possible time as to the date when they wish to assume responsibility for the continuing operation of the Distant Early Warning Line in Canada."

2. This subject has been carefully reviewed by the departments of Government concerned and has recently been considered by Ministers. As a result of this consideration I have been asked to communicate the following decision to the United States Section of the Board.

3. It is the Canadian view that conditions are unlikely to arise which would lead the Canadian Government to assume responsibility for the Canadian portion of the Distant Early Warning Line during the period from 1960 to 1963. From the standpoint of efficient operation it appears wise, for some years at least, to have one nation responsible for the manning and operation of the entire DEW system. To this factor of efficiency must be added financial and manpower considerations. Taking into account the substantial contribution which Canada is now making to the continental defence system, notably on the Pinetree chain and the Mid-Canada Line, it does not appear feasible for Canada to assume additional responsibility on the DEW Line in the 1960-1963 period. In reaching this decision the Canadian authorities have been influenced by the view that, should it be concluded in the future that any additional Canadian contribution should be made to continental defence, there are other activities which might be more effectively undertaken by Canada than the operation of the DEW Line.

4. It is of course recognized that there are manifest advantages in having each country responsible for defence arrangements and installations situated within its territory, when this proves feasible and consistent with efficient operation. With this thought in mind, the Canadian Government wishes to keep open the possibility of reconsidering, during the 1960-63 period, its present decision should changing circumstances warrant such reconsideration. In such an eventuality, the Canadian Government would give ample advance notification of its intentions.

5. Subject to the above considerations it would be understood that the operation of the Canadian portion of the Distant Early Warning Line during the 1960-63 period be continued by the United States under the same terms and conditions as it was agreed between our two Governments should govern the initial three-year period of operation of the Line.

I am inclined to agree that the deleted sentence should be omitted. L.B. P[earson]

These conditions were stated in the meetings of the PJBD on July 11, 1955[84] and January 16, 1956, and were set out as Appendix "A" to the Journal of the January, 1956 meeting.[85]

Le secrétaire du Conseil du Trésor
au secrétaire du Cabinet

Secretary to Treasury Board to Secretary to Cabinet

Ottawa, May 9, 1957

Dear Mr. Bryce:

At to-day's meeting the Treasury Board considered the recommendation of the Minister of Transport that approval in principle be given for the purchase of lightering equipment for the sea supply of eastern Arctic DEW Line Stations in the Foxe Basin area, contingent upon the acceptance by United States authorities of the estimate of cost for the procurement and sealift to commence in 1958, and subject also to the provision of the required funds by Parliament in the autumn and in the interim by means of the transfer between allotments procedure within the Marine Service Steamers capital vote. The Board concurred in this recommendation, subject to approval by the Cabinet.

Consideration has been given for some time, at the official level, to the Canadian Government taking on the responsibility for the sealift to the DEW Line Stations in the Foxe Basin area, north of Hudson Bay. This has culminated in the preparation of an estimate of cost by the Department of Transport for consideration by the United States authorities and has been put forward to the USAF on the basis of Canada taking over the operation commencing in 1958, on a reimbursable basis. This estimate does not include allowance for certain features, some of which would be covered by insurance or are the normal responsibilities of the Canadian Government in the north, for example, replacement of vessels in the event of loss, extraordinary damages, salvage, costs of icebreaking assistance by the Department of Transport, etc. However, the estimate does involve the acquisition and modification of certain ship to shore equipment, namely, two LCT8's and three LCM's, the capital cost of which is to be written off over a ten year period as part of the costs to be reimbursed by the United States.

In the proposal put forward to the United States authorities the urgency of an early reply was stressed in view of the fact that the Department would have to take action in June to acquire two additional LCT8's from United Kingdom sources for this purpose in time to tow them over during the summer and have them converted in time for next year's operation. The Department understands informally that the United States is expected to accept the proposal, but for usual reasons there may be some little delay before they are heard from officially. At that time it will be necessary for the Department to act very promptly and, therefore, advance Treasury Board approval was sought for immediate action at that time for acquisition of the two LCT8's.

No funds were included for this purpose in Departmental Estimates and it will be necessary accordingly to make the necessary provision in Estimates in the autumn, but any expenditures required for this purpose before that time could be met, it is believed, through a transfer in the vote for construction and acquisition of vessels, given approval of such a transfer. Insofar as the sealift operating and procurement costs are concerned, the Department will discuss with the United States authorities the method of payments necessary to cover the outlay that will be involved by Transport and Defence Production. Some assurance of prompt availability of funds from United States sources to meet current accounts will be necessary, and it is thought that, with prompt repayments by the United States, temporary use could be made of funds now available in the Marine Service Steamers Operating Vote for purposes of the transportation operating expenses, with reimbursements credited to that vote.

It might be noted that in January, 1956, Cabinet dealt with the resupply of the western Arctic DEW Line Stations and approved the recommendation of the Minister of Transport that Canada would assume responsibility for the sea supply of these stations by the use of the Mackenzie River system and the designation of the Northern Transportation Company as the Canadian agency for planning and organization of the undertaking, all on a reimbursable basis. While it was expected that the decision in respect of the western Arctic sea supply would permit the operation to be carried out at a lower cost and under less dangerous conditions than the method previously employed, namely, convoy around Pt. Barrow, the approved arrangement, in addition, applied to the operational period the same principle which had been followed during the construction phase of the DEW Line, namely, that Canadian commercial carriers would, to the fullest extent practicable, be afforded the opportunity to participate in the movement of materials, equipment, etc; moreover, by reason of the supply operation originating in Canada, procurement would, to a much larger degree, be made in Canada than if the operation were carried out from United States points.

If this proposal is approved by the Cabinet,[86] it will mean that the operation will be carried out directly by the Department of Transport, the annual cost of the operation being estimated at approximately $1.3 million, based on the following:

Ship to Shore Operation (Including amortization of purchase and modification costs of LCT8's and LCM's, without interest)	$ 411,000
Transportation Costs (Charter hire and stevedoring)	$ 581,020
Procurement Costs (Approximately 2.2 million U.S. gals. Avgas and Diesel oil)	$ 322,851
Total	$1,314,871

In the future it is hoped to integrate this operation as much as possible with that carried out in respect of the Mid-Canada Line supply further south in Hudson Bay and there may be [86] Cette proposition a été approuvé par le Cabinet le 9 mai 1957.

This proposal was approved by Cabinet on May 9, 1957.

resultant savings in the use of equipment which would lower the cost to the United States of the Foxe Basin operation.

The Department of Transport intends in due course to report to the United States authorities upon the feasibility of Canadian assumption of responsibility for the sea supply of the other eastern Arctic DEW Line sites, particularly with regard to Baffin Island, but would not be in a position to so report until the coming autumn or winter.

Yours truly,

D.M. WATTERS

DISPOSITION OF THE CANOL PIPELINES

At the fortieth meeting of the Advisory Committee on Northern Development the disposition of the Canol pipelines was discussed. It was agreed that a report on the Washington meetings to discuss the pipelines should be prepared for distribution to members of the Committee.

The attached paper has been prepared by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

G.W. ROWLEY

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du sous-ministre des Affaires du Nord et des Ressources nationales

Memorandum by Deputy Minister, Northern Affairs and National Resources

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 1, 1957

DISPOSITION OF THE CANOL PIPELINES

The position taken by the U.S. Army regarding the disposition of the remaining Canol pipelines has changed materially during the past nine months. The latest changes, which were of basic importance, have only been made known to us in two documents† which were received on April 23 and April 25. The following paper will describe the background of the situation and the course which the negotiations have followed. It will then make recommendations as to the next step.

2. During the war a series of agreements was entered into between the Canadian and United States governments which covered the building and operation by the U.S. Army of certain pipelines and appurtenant facilities on Canadian soil. The pipelines were:

4-inch line from Norman Wells to Whitehorse;
4-inch line from Skagway to Whitehorse via Carcross;
2-inch line from Carcross to Watson Lake;
3-inch line from Whitehorse to Fairbanks.

3. It was the implicit understanding of the Canadian government that the ownership and operation of these pipelines by the U.S. Army were wartime arrangements which would be terminated at the end of hostilities. The pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse was in fact disposed of by agreement in 1947. In 1954 the U.S. government declared the 2-inch line from Carcross to Watson Lake to be surplus. The U.S. Army, with no objection from the Canadian Government, continued to own and operate the 4-inch line from Skagway to Whitehorse and the 3-inch line from Whitehorse to Fairbanks. The Canadian authorities assumed, however, that once the 8-inch Haines-Fairbanks pipeline, constructed under an agreement concluded in 1953, was in operation there would be no need for the U.S. Army to continue to operate the 4-inch Skagway-Whitehorse pipeline and the 3-inch Whitehorse-Fairbanks line.

4. In view of the growing need for pipeline facilities to serve the general economic development of the Yukon, a preliminary meeting between officials of the Governments of Canada and the United States was held on July 19, 1956 to discuss the conditions under which these pipelines might be turned over to Canada. The Canadian point of view, as outlined in the preceding paragraph, was accepted by the American officials without reservation. They pointed out, however, that the 8-inch Haines-Fairbanks pipeline had been inoperative for several weeks last winter, and therefore it was essential that the 4-inch line from Skagway to Whitehorse and the 3-inch line from Whitehorse to Fairbanks be available to the U.S. government as a standby. They agreed with the Canadian officials that there seemed to be no reason why these pipelines could not be operated for commercial purposes by a Canadian entity and at the same time be available for emergency use by the United States Army. The U.S. officials at the meeting made no reference to Canada paying any recompense for the 3-inch line, and the Canadians assumed that the Americans regarded Canada's assumption of the obligation that the line would be maintained and available as a standby as sufficient recompense. The meeting agreed that the Department of External Affairs should give the U.S. Embassy a memorandum outlining the principles, as agreed at the meeting, which should govern the transfer of the lines, and that further meetings would be held to discuss the details. A memorandum† was sent to the U.S. Embassy on September 24, 1956. A reply† dated April 24, 1957, was received on April 25.

5. In December, 1956, the Canadian government decided that, subject to the completion of negotiations for Canada to take over the lines from the United States, and subject also to certain conditions, the White Pass and Yukon Route would have the right to operate the 4-inch pipeline and Alaska-Yukon Refiners and Distributors (formerly known as Shamrock Petroleum) would have the right to operate the 3-inch and 2-inch pipelines. In brief, the conditions were (a) that the pipelines would be kept continuously in operating condition and the 4-inch and 3-inch lines would be made available for the use of the U.S. government in the case of a national emergency or a failure of the 8-inch Haines-Fairbanks pipeline, (b) that all the pipelines would be operated as common carriers, (c) that the White Pass would move the 4-inch line sufficiently far from the tracks that it would be safe for the transport of gasoline, (d) that Alaska-Yukon Refiners and Distributors would build a pipeline from Haines to connect with the 3-inch pipeline, (e) that Alaska-Yukon Refiners and Distributors would restore the 2-inch pipeline to operating condition, and (f) that the companies would be given a long-term lease to the pipelines at a rental which would be nominal for an initial period, the government then having the right to review the situation.

6. The White Pass & Yukon, in replying to this offer, pointed out that the U.S. Army is under an obligation to remove the pipeline at any place where it is within 5' of the tracks, and the Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs replied that the government did not mind who moved the pipeline as long as it was moved.

7. In February, 1957, a meeting was held in Washington between Canadian and U.S. government officials to arrange the details for the transfer of title to the pipeline. It became apparent at this meeting that the U.S. officials had developed, on one or two important points, very different views to those which had been expressed at the July, 1956, meetings. Furthermore, there have been further changes in the American viewpoint as expressed in documents which have subsequently been received.

8. The most important new factor which appeared at the February meeting was the demand by the U.S. that the pipelines should be appraised and transferred to Canada at their commercial value. The U.S. representatives presented a Draft Army Proposal of points which should be included in the ultimate Exchange of Notes, and paragraph 4 reads as follows:

> "The conveyance of that portion of the 4-inch pipeline facility (Canol No. 2) located in Alaska; the 2-inch pipeline facility (Canol No. 3); and that portion of the 3-inch pipeline facility (Canol No. 4) located in Canada will be at the current commercial value in accordance with Exchange of Notes dated 26 February 1945, the current commercial value to be determined by two appraisers, of whom one shall be named by the United States and one by Canada, with power, if they disagree, to appoint an umpire."

9. The suggestion that there should be an appraisal and that the line should be transferred to Canada at the appraised commercial value put an entirely new element into the discussions from the Canadian point of view. The Canadian representatives pointed out that the lines were not being transferred under the circumstances envisaged in the earlier Exchange of Notes, which contemplated that the U.S. Army would have no further use for them. The only provision for maintenance was that the pipelines should not be dismantled without the consent of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In the present case, however, the U.S. government was proposing to turn title of the lines over to Canada only if Canada would undertake the obligation that the lines would be kept continuously in operating condition and would be available as a standby, to be used by the U.S. government in the event of either a national emergency or trouble with the 8-inch pipeline, which according to the views expressed at the July 1956 meeting, was a contingency which might well occur. To this the U.S. representatives replied that the value of any obligations assumed by Canada would be taken into account in appraising the pipeline.

10. The Canadian representatives at the meeting tried to get some indication as to whether the Americans expected that an appraised value would be merely a nominal figure or a substantial figure, but could get none. Subsequently, however, we have had discussions with a pipeline expert who examined the 4-inch line in 1955, and he expressed the opinion that the line is in very good condition. We therefore should assume that an appraisal would place a substantial and not a nominal value on the lines.

11. Another position of importance taken by the U.S. representatives was that they wished Canada to accept any outstanding obligations which the U.S. government might have in respect of the 4-inch pipeline. The Canadian representatives said that Canada would be willing to accept the 4-inch pipeline only if it was free of all encumbrances, and specifically, if the U.S. government had made some arrangement to satisfy its obligation to the White Pass Railway in respect to moving the 4-inch line off the tracks. The Americans stated that, if the United States had to move the 4-inch line, this would undoubtedly be taken into account in appraising the Alaska portion of that line.

12. As indicated earlier, there has been a change in American views since that meeting. On April 23 we received a Revised Draft Army Proposal, and this proposal no longer suggested that the 4-inch and 3-inch pipelines should be available in the event of a failure of the 8-inch pipeline. The only requirement was that they should be available to the U.S. government on a priority basis if needed in the case of a national emergency. To indicate the precise difference, paragraph 2 in the first Draft Proposal reads as follows:

> "2. The United States reserves the right to take over immediate use and possession of the above-mentioned 4-inch and 3-inch pipeline facilities (Canol No. 2 and 4) at any time within _____ from the date of this agreement to meet military requirements of the United States during a national emergency declared by the President or the Congress of the United States or in event of a breakdown of the Haines-Fairbanks 8-inch petroleum pipeline. During such period as the United States may have use and possession of the facilities, the United States will pay a fair rental as may be mutually agreed upon, such rental however not to include any compensation for the portion of Canol No. 2 pipeline located within Canada."

The same paragraph in the revised Draft Proposal reads as follows:

> "2. If, during a period of national emergency declared by the President or the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Army determines that it is necessary to use the above-mentioned pipeline facilities to meet United States requirements, then upon notification to Canada, the United States will be afforded a priority right to use the above-mentioned 4-inch and 3-inch pipeline facilities in Canada. Payment for the operation of the pipeline facility to furnish petroleum products for the United States will be made at such terms as may be mutually agreed upon. The obligations of Canada and the United States under this proviso shall terminate at the end of the economic life of the facility as specified in paragraph 1 above."

13. The U.S. requirement that the 4-inch and 3-inch line be available to meet U.S. military requirements in the event of a national emergency is also expressed in the memorandum from the U.S. Embassy dated April 24, 1957 as follows:

> "That any lease, contract for operations, agreement of sale or other agreement covering the pipelines in Canada must contain a provision that will ensure the pipelines shall be made available to meet United States military requirements in a national emergency."

14. Another point of interest in the U.S. Revised Draft is that it modifies the demand that there shall be an appraisal and that the pipelines shall be transferred at their commercial value. The clause in the original Draft Proposal is quoted in paragraph 8 above. The relevant clause in the Revised Draft is as follows:

> "The conveyance of that portion of the 3-inch pipeline facility (Canol No. 4) located in Canada, and the 2-inch pipeline facility (Canol No. 3) will be at the current commercial value. The exchange of notes dated 26 February 1945, while not applicable to all pipelines involved in this exchange of notes, will be used as a guide for procedures to be followed in determination of current commercial value."

It is hard to determine the precise significance of the curious phrase "shall be used as a guide for procedures to be followed". It is not quite clear what is the difference between stating, on the one hand, that the pipelines shall be disposed of at a commercial value to be determined by an appraisal, and on the other, that an appraisal "shall be used as a guide for procedures to be followed in determination of current commercial value." Presumably, however, there is some difference, because otherwise there would be no point in having used different words.

15. The final point of interest in the U.S. Revised Draft was that it omitted any specific reference to Canada assuming any obligations which the U.S. government may have in respect to any of the pipelines (specifically, the obligation to move the 4-inch pipeline off the White Pass track). However, the opening statement in the Revised Draft reads as follows:

> "The United States proposes that Canada accept the transfer and conveyance of all right, title and interest of the United States in and to that portion of the 4-inch petroleum pipeline facility known as Canol No. 2, located within Canada ... etc.".

This would appear to imply that Canada will take over any unsatisfied obligations along with title to the line. Moreover the memorandum from the U.S. Embassy dated April 24, 1957 states that the U.S. Army accepts in principle that title to the pipelines be transferred to Canada provided "that the proposal can be implemented without cost to the United States". It would appear, therefore, that the U.S. government is still attempting to arrange that the pipelines be transferred to Canada without the U.S. paying the cost of moving the 4-inch pipeline. The significant point to remember, however, is that the U.S. Army has a contract with the White Pass and Yukon Route, entered into in 1947 without the Canadian government being any part of it, which requires that the U.S. government remove the pipeline where it is within 5' of the track when the contract comes to an end. The contract comes to an end on September 30, 1957 unless it is terminated earlier. The position which the Canadian representatives have consistently taken is that the completion of this contract between the U.S. Army and the White Pass is a matter in which Canada has no concern, and is from the U.S. government turning over title of the pipelines to Canada. The U.S. representatives, however, are clearly unwilling to regard it in this light.

Present Position

The question of the position to be taken by Canada in the light of the proposals by the United States is being studied. While definite conclusions have not yet been reached, it seems clear that Canada should not acquiesce in a situation in which the United States appears to be seeking to require the appraisal and full valuation procedure contemplated in Note 710 of June 1942 and at the same time impose substantial new conditions. That Note contemplated a situation in which the pipelines would no longer be required for defence purposes and would therefore be sold, the only recognition of a possible ultimate defence need being the provision that the line should not be dismantled without the approval of the P.J.B.D. Under the current proposal, however, Canada would be required to make the lines available for U.S. defence needs in time of a national emergency. Canada would also, under Clause I of the U.S. Revised Draft, be required to maintain the pipeline facilities, "in such manner as to assure their integrity and continued availability for the transportation of petroleum products for the defence needs of the United States and for the mutual defense of the United States and Canada for their remaining economic life which is agreed to be _____."

Tentatively, and subject to further consideration, it appears that the course to take is to advise the U.S. authorities that, in the view of Canada, the U.S. Draft Proposal does not contemplate the circumstances envisaged in the Note of 1942. If the United States wishes to have additional conditions applied, along the lines of their Revised Draft Proposal, we could indicate that this would require a new agreement. This agreement would provide that title to the pipelines would be transferred to Canada, free of all encumbrances, in return for Canada undertaking that the pipelines would be maintained in continuous operating condition and would be available for U.S. defense needs in time of a national emergency. This new agreement, of course, would refer only to those portions of the pipeline which lie in Canada, and it would appear that the question of the removal of the Alaska portion of the 4-inch pipeline would have to be left to negotiations between the White Pass and the U.S. government.

If, on the other hand, the U.S. government wishes to adhere to the principle of appraisal and disposal at the commercial value, we could indicate that under such circumstances Canada would not bid for the pipelines. The sale would have to be to companies incorporated in Canada and those companies could not be required to undertake obligations vis-à-vis the United States. The only obligation would be that of the Government of Canada, under the 1942 Note, that the lines would not be dismantled without P.J.B.D. approval.

Any views by members of the Advisory Committee on this matter would be appreciated.[87]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 107-56 [Ottawa], May 9, 1956

CERTAIN NORTHERN AIR STRIPS

The air strips at Cambridge Bay (CAM), Hall Lake (FOX) and Frobisher, N.W.T., on or in direct support of the DEW Line, have a high potential value for civil aviation in northern Canada and for the general development of the north, and, of the various stations on or in support of the DEW Line, they are the most likely to have extensive civil use.

Approval in principle is sought for the Department of Transport to assume responsibility for the operation of these air strips, the aids to navigation, and the meteorological and communications systems essential to civil air operations.

Frobisher is now under the jurisdiction of the R.C.A.F., but it is the U.S.A.F. which provides the necessary personnel and the airfield equipment. The Department of Transport provides radio and meteorological personnel and plans to erect this summer a building for these services.

[87] Le Comité consultatif sur le développement du Nord a étudié ce document à sa réunion du 6 mai 1957 et a convenu de réexaminer la politique canadienne à la lumière des dernières propositions des États-Unis. The Advisory Committee on Northern Development reviewed this paper at its meeting on May 6, 1957 and agreed to study further Canadian policy in view of the latest U.S. proposals.

At Cambridge Bay the Department provides only radio personnel who are stationed about four miles from the DEW Line air strip.

At Hall Lake, a completely new station, there are at present no Department of Transport personnel although Canadian meteorological personnel will be posted there this year.

The proposal that the Department of Transport assume the responsibilities above mentioned was considered by the Advisory Committee on Northern Development at a meeting on April 16th. The Committee — because of the growing importance of great circle flying between northern Europe and western America and between northern Europe and northern Asia, the extensive activities in the Arctic archipelago, the growing interest in mineral development in the area, and the desirability of constantly asserting Canadian sovereignty — strongly supported the proposal that the air strips be operated by the Department of Transport.

On the assumption that to begin with food and lodging would be provided in the U.S. buildings, the initial capital cost would be about $125,000, and the annual maintenance cost would be about $300,000-$400,000, depending on how much Eskimo help can be obtained. These costs are in addition to present expenditures for meteorological services and telecommunications at these points. To provide separate Canadian buildings at CAM and FOX, and to move certain buildings from Cambridge Bay to CAM, there could be additional construction costs of about $1,000,000, though these expenditures might be postponed for a time, if arrangements are made with the U.S.A.F. for accommodation and board.

If this proposal is approved in principle, it is intended to open negotiations with the appropriate U.S. authorities to work out the terms under which the air strips would be operated and to settle such details as: whether the contractor can provide board and lodging for some or all of the personnel, whether the airport maintenance equipment and maintenance shop can be made available, what communication facilities would be required and where they would be housed; the provision of fuel; the use of the air supply airlift system established by the contractor, and similar matters.

The proposal contemplates that the taking over period would be two or three years, depending in part on the outcome of the negotiations with regard to the matters mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

Accordingly, I recommend:

1. That approval in principle be granted for the Department of Transport to assume responsibility for the operation of the above mentioned air strips, the aids to navigation and the meteorological and communications systems essential to civil air operations;

2. Approval of the opening of the negotiations with the appropriate U.S. authorities to work out the terms under which the air strips would be operated and to settle the relative details.[88]

V. EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION TO U.S.A.F. TO STATION FORCES AT R.C.A.F. STATION, FROBISHER BAY

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, subject to certain conditions, the U.S.A.F. had been authorized in 1951 to repair the wartime facilities at Frobisher Bay and station there up to 150 military personnel. The U.S.A.F., through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, had indicated there would be a continuing need for the use of the airport in support of the Distant Early Warning Line and the northeast line of communications. The U.S.A.F. had made provision in its 1957 construction programme for badly needed improvements in the facilities but before such an expenditure could be authorized it was felt that assurance of the right of occupancy for a longer period would be required. Twenty years had been suggested.

In reply to this request it had been stated that twenty years seemed to be out of keeping with the arrangements made between the two countries in connection with other defence projects and that the U.S. would be better advised to consider an arrangement similar to that adopted in the case of the DEW line. The U.S. authorities agreed with this suggestion and proposed that notes be exchanged which would grant the U.S.A.F. the right to station forces at Frobisher for a period of ten years or such shorter period as might be mutually agreed. The Advisory Committee on Northern Development concurred in the proposal.

He recommended, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, that he be authorized to exchange notes agreeing to this proposal.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 15, 1956 — Document D8-56†).

16. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The government had agreed in principle that the air strips at Hall Lake, Cambridge Bay and Frobisher Bay be manned by the Department of Transport but a final decision was postponed pending an approach to the U.S. to see if the arrangements which could be worked out might be acceptable. It was most desirable that the proper control of Frobisher be in Canadian hands and it would also be desirable to announce any new arrangements regarding the Department of Transport assumption of control at the same time as it was agreed to allow the U.S.A.F. to have a longer term of tenure at Frobisher Bay.

(b) Frobisher was an exceptionally busy airport and would continue to be so for some time. By far the largest proportion of traffic was American and it would therefore be sensible to allow the U.S. to continue to exercise the kind of control which it now had. It was argued, on the other hand, that Canadian aircraft used the base to a certain degree, that it was an alternate base for airlines flying over the Pole and that it was desirable in principle that this be a Canadian installation.

(c) There was no doubt that it would be a strain on the Department of Transport to control and operate Frobisher effectively. A memorandum should be prepared as soon as possible indicating the Department of Transport's plans for this new assignment and the resources involved.

17. The Committee noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the proposal for the terms of tenure for the stationing of United States Air Force units at Frobisher Bay, and agreed to recommend that, subject to a reconciliation with the previous decision of the government concerning the operation by the Department of Transport of the airfields at Frobisher and two other locations, notes be exchanged with the United States permitting the U.S.A.F. to station forces at Frobisher for a period of ten years or such shorter period as may be mutually agreed.

CIVIL OPERATION OF FROBISHER AIRPORT, N.W.T.

On May 10th, 1956, Cabinet considered the possibility of the Department of Transport operating certain major air strips connected with the Distant Early Warning Line, where extensive civil use was foreseen, and deferred decision until discussions with U.S. authorities had shown what arrangements could be made. It was understood that priority would be given Frobisher, N.W.T., where the R.C.A.F. had jurisdiction over the air strip, the U.S.A.F. provides personnel and airfield equipment, and the Department of Transport provides radio and meteorological personnel.

Subsequently representatives of the government departments concerned met and agreed to recommend that D.O.T. should take over operation of Frobisher airport on a "phasing in" basis commencing September 1, 1957, and U.S.A.F., R.C.A.F. and D.O.T. have now agreed in principle on the conditions for future use and operation of the base, the arrangement to be embodied in a formal Exchange of Notes. The main points of the proposed arrangement are as follows:

(1) U.S.A.F. to be permitted to remain in occupancy for a ten-year period subject to renegotiation (Cabinet earlier deferred decision on a Defence Committee recommendation to this effect, pending decision on the transfer to Transport);

(2) Allocation of a defined area to U.S.A.F.;

(3) Location of buildings by U.S.A.F. to be in accordance with D.O.T. zoning;

(4) Major airport works, such as runway extensions, required by U.S.A.F. to be paid for by them but controlled (i.e. contracts let) by Canada.

Next year's estimates for telecommunications and meteorological services at Frobisher include $410,000 for operation and $288,000 for capital expenditures, and these will be incurred whether take-over takes place or not. Next year's estimates also include provision for the first phase of the take-over, and it is estimated that when the take-over is completed by 1959 additional annual operating costs of the airfield will be about $200,000. There would also be capital expenditures of $400,000 to $500,000, which would be spread over the three-year period commencing next year, but the exact amount cannot be determined finally until it is known what U.S. equipment will be available and, consequently, no provision has been made for these expenditures in next year's estimates.

It is recommended that approval be given of:

(1) The transfer from the R.C.A.F. to the Department of Transport effective September 1, 1957, of jurisdiction over Frobisher Airport; and

(2) The negotiation by Canada with U.S.A. of an agreement as to the division of duties and responsibilities, management, and operating procedure.

Memorandum from Secretary, Canadian Section, to Canadian members, Permanent Joint Board on Defence

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 15, 1957

EXTENSION OF U.S. AIR FORCE TENURE AT FROBISHER BAY AIRPORT

The Cabinet on January 10 approved the recommendation of the Minister of Transport concerning Frobisher Bay Airport which was set out in the latter's memorandum of January 4, a copy of which is included in the briefs of the Canadian Section. Cabinet's approval was in the following terms:

(a) "That jurisdiction over Frobisher Bay Airport, N.W.T. be transferred from the RCAF to the Department of Transport as of September 1, 1957, and

(b) "That Canada negotiate with the United States an agreement as to the division of duties and responsibility in management and operating procedures on the base; it being understood that the agreement would cover occupancy by the USAF of a definite portion of the base and its facilities for a period of ten years subject to renegotiation and would also include among other matters arrangements as to the zoning of buildings in the special portion as well as elsewhere, and the letting of contracts for new works therein subject to the approval of Canadian authorities."

The USAF has been pressing in the Board for a decision as to the period of time which will be agreed to by the Canadian authorities for the continued stationing of USAF personnel at Frobisher. It would seem possible now to give the USAF assurance through the PJBD channel that the Canadian Government is prepared to grant tenure in terms similar to those set out in the DEW Line Agreement, even though formal Canadian Government agreement on the tenure question will be set out in the exchange of notes which would include all conditions for future use and operation of the base. These conditions are presently under negotiation between the Department of Transport and the USAF and no difficulty is expected in reaching agreement on the details. It is suggested that the Chairman, Canadian Section, might lead off discussion of the Frobisher item with some general remarks which would include something along the following lines on the tenure question for inclusion in the Journal:

"It is gratifying to be able to report significant progress on this item. Interested officials from our two Governments have met since our last Board meeting and have reached substantial agreement on the terms and conditions for continued use of Frobisher by the USAF. Since our last meeting as well Canadian Ministers have approved the transfer of jurisdiction over Frobisher Bay Airport from the RCAF to the Department of Transport to become effective September 1, 1957. Ministers have also approved negotiation with the United States of an agreement as to the division of duties and responsibility in management and operating procedures on the base. Ministers understood that the agreement, among other things, would cover occupancy by the USAF of a definite portion of the base and its facilities for a period of ten years, subject to renegotiation.

"I can now, therefore, inform the members of the Board that the Canadian Government will be prepared to authorize the continued use of Frobisher by the USAF on a basis similar to that provided in the DEW Line Agreement, i.e. for a period of ten years, or such shorter period as shall be agreed by both countries in the light of their mutual defence interests. It is my understanding that the question of tenure will be covered formally in the exchange of notes which will result from the negotiations between officials of our two Governments which are currently underway, and to which I have already referred".

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 16, 1956

Dear Mr. Stuart,

I should like to refer to the discussions which have been going on for some time between officers of your Embassy and the Department of External Affairs concerning the proposed establishment by the United States armed forces of low-power television broadcasting stations at the U.S. Naval Station, Argentia, Newfoundland; at Ernest Harmon Air Force Base, near Stephenville, Newfoundland; and at Goose Air Force Base, Goose Bay, Newfoundland.[89] You will recall that when I discussed this proposal with you recently I said that I would send you a letter setting out what the Canadian Government was prepared to do by way of meeting this request.

As you know, the laws of Canada do not permit the granting of a radio station licence to persons who are not British subjects, except where such stations are necessary to the carrying out of defence arrangements. Nevertheless the Canadian Government views sympathetically the desire of the United States authorities to provide television for their personnel at relatively isolated bases beyond the range of Canadian stations. To meet the situation, it would be prepared to permit the United States armed forces to install television broadcasting stations at Harmon and Goose Air Force Bases under the direct supervision and control of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which would itself hold the licences and provide up to one-third of the broadcast material. In order to conform with the broadcasting policy of the Canadian Government, and because the broadcasts would be available to a considerable number of Canadian citizens, it is considered essential that the stations should include a reasonable proportion of Canadian material in their broadcasts.

The operation of the stations at Harmon and Goose Bay Air Force Bases would be authorized for an initial period of five years, but might be closed at any time thereafter in the event of the establishment of a Canadian station providing television coverage.

The Canadian Government regrets that it cannot permit the establishment of a television station at Argentia. It is understood, however, that the licensee of the commercial television station at St. John's is anxious to ensure coverage at the Base area. He has had indications that the signal is satisfactory, but has also said if the need for further improvement develops he would apply for permission to install some form of "booster" or "satellite" especially to strengthen the signal around the Base area. The Canadian authorities would regard such an application favourably if such installation is found necessary.

If the conditions, as described above, under which the Canadian Government is prepared to authorize the establishment of television stations at Harmon and Goose Bay, are acceptable to the United States authorities, I propose that before any action is taken toward the establishment of the stations your Embassy should arrange through the Department of External Affairs to have the officers concerned with setting up the stations discuss the detailed arrangements, including the question of operators, with the appropriate Canadian officials.

As you are no doubt aware, the United States armed forces are operating sound radio broadcasting stations at Harmon, Argentia, and Pepperrell Bases. These stations were established during the Second World War and the Canadian Government has permitted their continued operation on an unlicensed basis since Newfoundland entered Confederation. It seems to us that the establishment of the new television stations which are proposed will inevitably draw attention to these unlicensed radio stations. As I believe you know, the Canadian Government would like to see the operation of these radio stations at the Leased Bases discontinued.

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

RADIO STATIONS AT U.S. BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

The Under-Secretary informed me that Mr. Stuart came to see the Minister yesterday and expressed concern about the final paragraph of the Minister's letter to Mr. Stuart of January 16 about U.S. television stations in Newfoundland. Apparently the outcome of this talk was that the Minister undertook to send Mr. Stuart a letter giving a liberal interpretation of the phrase "as I believe you know, the Canadian Government would like the operation of these radio stations at the leased bases discontinued".

2. I suppose that Mr. Pearson might take the line in such a letter that this phrase indicated a preference rather than a condition and that it referred to the operation of U.S. stations where Canadian stations were already giving service. I suppose that it would be necessary to consult Mr. Pickersgill as well as other departments concerned before a draft is submitted to the Minister.[90]

[90] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Ignatieff: I had a talk with Rewinkle about this. He tells me that Mr. Stuart is under the impression that Mr. Pearson told him that the statement re closing of the radio-stations was "just for the record" in case the issue was raised publicly, and that we don't really expect the stations to be closed for an indefinite period. Mr. Stuart apparently expects the second letter to convey this understanding. Under the circumstances I am chary about preparing a draft until we have more specific info on the Min[ister]'s understanding of the conversation. W.H. B[arton]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 23, 1956

Dear Doug [Stuart],

I am writing this letter, as promised, to confirm our conversation the other day with respect to the radio and television stations at the Leased Bases.

May I say first that although, as your know, the Canadian Government would like to see the operation of the radio stations discontinued, the approval of the arrangements for the operation of the television stations is in no sense conditional upon this being done. However, once the television stations go on the air public attention is almost certain to be drawn to the operation of the radio stations. The United States authorities therefore might consider that to be an appropriate time to consider whether the radio stations should be continued. Once satisfactory television arrangements have been made, there may not be the same need for radio reception of this kind.

Secondly, I should like to assure you that we share your desire to see that there is adequate reception at Argentia of the commercially-operated television station in St. John's. The Canadian Government will urge the operator of the station to take whatever action is necessary, such as the installation of some form of "booster" or "satellite", to ensure that the signal strength is adequate. We have requested the Department of Transport and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to keep us informed of the progress on this matter, and the Department of External Affairs, in turn, will see that the officers on your staff are notified of developments.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, October 9, 1956

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I refer to discussions between officials of our two Governments as to possible ways of providing television service at Ernest Harmon Air Force Base and Goose Air Force Base.

It is understood that in the normal course of events the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would not be prepared at this time to establish television stations at either of these bases. However, the United States authorities are most desirous that a television service be provided and, to this end, have indicated their willingness to construct, equip, maintain and man television stations at Harmon and Goose Bay if the CBC will agree to establish and operate them.

I understand that the CBC feels, in these circumstances, that the expense to the CBC in operating such stations, would, on the above basis, be justified since national service to Canadian citizens in these areas would thus be provided.

The purpose of this letter is to re-affirm the understanding of the United States authorities that these stations, when established, will be, for all purposes, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations, operated in accordance with the rules and regulations of the CBC.

Sincerely,

LIVINGSTON T. MERCHANT

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 9, 1956

Dear Mr. Thompson,

With reference to Mr. Merchant's letter to Mr. Pearson of this date, I wish to state that it is of course understood that the ownership of the equipment for the television stations at Ernest Harmon Air Force Base and Goose Air Force Base, and of the buildings in which the equipment is housed, will remain with the United States Government acting through the United States Air Force.

It is also understood that, so long as the United States desires, the operation of these stations is authorized for an initial period of five years, but might be closed at any time thereafter in the event of the establishment of a Canadian station providing television coverage.

In addition, it is understood that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, at no cost to the United States, may provide one-third of the broadcast material and will provide a station manager for each station. The United States will provide, at its expense, the technical operators at each of the stations who will, in all cases, be uniformed personnel.

The Canadian Government recognizes that it is not possible at this time to foresee the precise effect which application of its broadcasting regulations may have in some instances upon an operation of this kind and that, accordingly, such instances should be the subject of future consultations between the proper authorities of the two governments.

Yours sincerely,

R.M. MACDONNELL

UNITED STATES RADIO STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Arrangements for providing television to the U.S. Armed Forces in Newfoundland and Goose Bay appear to be working satisfactorily. As regards radio stations, however, (about which you wrote a "Dear Doug" letter to Mr. Stuart a year ago saying that the Government would like to see their operation discontinued) the U.S. Ambassador recently presented a request† that the existing Armed Forces stations (at Stephenville and St. John's) be allowed to continue. It is argued (and in considerable detail) that, in addition to helping morale "each of these stations meets a definite military need and serves a military purpose in support of Canadian-United States mutual defence efforts".

2. At the same time, the U.S. state their willingness to close "any or all of the radio stations in question, either now or at some specified future date, whenever requested to do so by the Canadian Government".

3. In putting forward their request, the U.S. Ambassador says "I am authorized to express the desire of the United States to continue the operation of each station under a formula acceptable to your Government, such as, for example, the C.B.C. licensing procedure now being followed with regard to the television stations at Goose Bay and Harmon". The C.B.C. tell us informally that this suggestion is most unacceptable to them. Mr. Pickersgill, who was consulted, says that while he is unimpressed by the arguments about the military value of the radio stations, he thinks it would be much better to go on tolerating the stations than to make any attempt to give them a regular status under the C.B.C.

4. The Department is inclined to share this view. The operation of these stations appears to be proceeding smoothly, giving satisfaction not only to the U.S. Armed Forces but to the local Canadian listening public, and giving rise to no important criticism that has come to the attention of the Department, the C.B.C. or Mr. Pickersgill. Would you agree that we give tacit consent to continued operation?[91] This would require exploration with the Department of Transport (as administrators of the Radio Act) and might take the form either of regarding the radio stations as performing just enough military functions to be regarded as contributing to defence, or by telling the United States that until they receive a reply (which may be a long time) it is understood that the operations will continue.[92]

NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS AT U.S. PACIFIC PROVING GROUNDS — REPORT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OBSERVER

Introduction

For the first time since 1946, the United States Government this year invited a group of foreign nationals to witness nuclear tests at its Pacific Proving Ground. The ten Canadians and five British officials who attended the tests thus became the first persons, other than Americans or Russians, to see a thermonuclear explosion.

2. The observer group totalled twenty, — five Canadian and five United States representatives of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, five officers representing the Canadian armed forces, and five officers representing the United Kingdom services (including one from the Civil Defence branch of the Home Office). We travelled by air to Eniwetok, arriving on July 14 and departing for home on July 21.

3. The Pacific Proving Ground is an ocean area of approximately 400 miles by 300 miles, embracing Eniwetok and Bikini atolls. These atolls are situated at about 11° North Latitude, about 2800 miles west and slightly south of Hawaii, Eniwetok being about 200 miles west of Bikini. The physiography and climate of these atolls have an important influence on the conduct of nuclear tests and merit a few words of comment. Each consists of a coral reef surrounding a lagoon of roughly circular shape about twenty miles in diameter. At frequent intervals the reef rises above water-level, forming a chain of small islets surrounding the lagoon. Even the largest of these islets is no more than two miles long and

also send to Paul Martin [L.B. Pearson] less than a mile wide, and some are little more than sand bars. All but the smallest have a heavy tropic vegetation, except where it has been cleared off by the Task Force conducting the tests.

4. The climate is warm and very humid but is made quite pleasant by the trade winds, which blow almost continuously. It is the presence of these trade winds, blowing from East to West, coupled with the absence of the movement of air masses or "fronts" which are characteristic in more temperate latitudes, which makes this area so suitable for nuclear tests.

Organization and Conduct of the Tests

5. All nuclear weapons tests are conducted by a permanent organization, Joint Task Force 7, with its headquarters in Washington. At present the Commander of the Task Force is a rear admiral, with officers of the same rank from the army, navy and air force as his deputies. In addition, there is a scientific deputy representing the AEC. All of these officers were at the Pacific Proving Ground during the four months (April-July) of the test series just concluded.

6. The task force is divided into five task groups — army, navy, air force, scientific, and construction (a civilian contractor). The total number of personnel fluctuates, but at the time of recent tests totalled more than 13,000, with all the logistic support, including aircraft, ships, and vehicles that one would expect the Americans to provide for an operation of this kind. The cost of the 1956 series, excluding the cost of the weapons, was estimated to be $150 million.

7. The test series just completed consisted of a total of 17 "shots", of which 5 or 6 were in the megaton range. The shots were fired in a variety of ways; by air drop, from towers, on the ground, and from barges anchored in shallow water on the reef of the atoll. Megaton bombs were fired at Bikini and kiloton weapons at Eniwetok in order to limit the danger to the extensive base facilities at the latter atoll.

8. The primary factor in determining whether or not a shot can be fired is the direction of the wind at various altitudes. The difficulties experienced at the time of the "Fortunate Dragon" incident clearly taught the experts a lesson, and as a consequence the weather prediction facilities established for the tests are very elaborate and the criteria which must be met before a shot can be fired have been set within very narrow limits. Weather stations have been established on all the islands within a distance of 500 miles from Eniwetok, destroyers proceed several hundred miles on set courses and take wind measurements by means of rockets which discharge "chaff" which in turn is tracked by radar, and a squadron of 12 B50 weather aircraft take regular observations. I am inclined to think that it is these precautionary measures rather than the development of a weapon with limited fall-out, to which Admiral Strauss referred when he said recently that the tests indicated that the fall-out problem could be localized.

9. The measurement of the effects of the shots is carried out mainly by aircraft, although extensive use is also made of instruments set up on islands in the test atoll and on ships. A typical test might involve the deployment of a dozen operational aircraft stationed at predetermined positions and altitudes in the vicinity of the explosion. Some aircraft will be taking pictures, others will be designated as "penetration aircraft" to fly through the cloud taking samples, and still others will be assigned an "effects" role and situated so as "to take advantage" of the blast, thermal, or radioactive effect, as the case may be. In the case of surface-fired weapons, an operational aircraft, e.g. the B-52, is always flown on a course so that it will be in the same position relative to the explosion as it would if it had dropped the bomb. We were given a very complete briefing on this phase of the operation and the RAF and RCAF took copious notes. The U.K. representatives will no doubt have a tale to tell the planners of their 1957 Christmas Island operation.

Test Shots Witnessed by Canadian Observers

10. Our group was fortunate in being able to see two shots, the final ones of the series. The shots were planned for Wednesday and Thursday, July 18 and 19, but because the winds were not quite satisfactory at all altitudes they were postponed day by day until the following Saturday and Sunday. Both shots were fired just before dawn, so we saw the fireballs in darkness but were able to follow the clouds in daylight.

First Shot

11. Saturday's shot was the largest in the 1956 series. Officially we were told it was in the 5-10 megaton range. We were given to understand privately that it was about 7-8 megatons — apparently the exact size of these experimental weapons cannot be predicted in advance and can only be determined on the basis of measurements made at the time of firing. It was fired from a barge anchored on the northern side of Bikini reef and we observed it from an aircraft flying at 17,000 feet sixty miles west of "ground zero". Generally speaking, the spectacle conformed to the descriptions everyone has read, but we were particularly impressed by the intensity of the initial flash, which lit up the whole sky just as though the sun were out and which lasted for a surprisingly long time — perhaps 30 seconds, and by the brilliant lavender luminescence of the cloud, which lasted two or three minutes after the initial flash had disappeared and which was caused by ionizing radiation. The rapid formation of the cloud was dramatic — the stem shot up into the air like the Geneva fountain, developed the typical mushroom head, and then seemed to penetrate it and keep on going. Knowing our distance and altitude we were able to estimate, probably with fair accuracy, the size of the cloud. The stem seemed to be about 2 miles in diameter, and the base of the mushroom about 30,000 feet high (two minutes after the explosion). The mushroom head spread out and gained altitude at tremendous speed. After three or four minutes the stem had widened to perhaps 3 miles and the diameter of the cloud to 30 miles. Once the initial luminescence faded it took on a sinister slate gray colour which contrasted sharply with the other clouds in the sky. An hour later the cloud was still very sharply defined although by this time we were looking at it from Eniwetok, nearly 200 miles from "ground zero". Our "experts" guessed that at this time the top of the cloud was at least 100,000 feet high and the diameter in the neighbourhood of 80-100 miles.

12. Because of other cloud formations it became increasingly difficult to see the man-made one, but we thought we could detect it as late as three hours after the time of firing.

13. We felt and heard nothing in the aircraft, but the fireball was clearly visible to personnel on the ground at Eniwetok (190 miles from the scene of the explosion) and the flash was seen at Kwajalein (about 400 miles from Bikini). A series of 12-14 shocks were felt at Eniwetok and a loud rumbling thunder was heard.

Second Shot

14. Sunday morning's test took place at Eniwetok atoll. The shot was fired from a barge anchored in the famous crater where the islet named Elugelab used to be until it was vaporized in the first thermonuclear explosion three years ago. We saw the explosion from the island of Eniwetok, about 16 miles across the lagoon from "ground zero". Officially we were informed that it was in the 100-500 kiloton range, and privately about 200 kilotons. Generally speaking, the sequence of events and effects was the same as for the previous day's test, except that the fireball was obviously smaller and of shorter duration, and the cloud was much more modest in size. However, since we were in the open, we were able to observe some effects which had not been possible the previous day. The most interesting was the blast of radiant heat which we felt on our faces for the few seconds of the duration of the fireball. It was just as though one had come in from out-of-doors and put his face within a foot or two of a Quebec heater with a hot fire. The stem of the cloud on this occasion was somewhat irregular and after perhaps three or four minutes seemed to be about 10,000 feet high and one-half mile in diameter. The mushroom was about 8 miles in diameter. It was obscured from our view shortly thereafter by intervening clouds. We felt the shock wave and heard a rumble of sound, but since there was a good breeze blowing in the direction of the explosion neither the shock wave nor the sound was very impressive. After the previous day's experience one might be inclined to deprecate this shot, but recollection of the fact that it was ten times as large as the Hiroshima explosion served as a useful antidote to any such ideas.

Incidental Impressions and Conclusions

15. It will be recalled that prior to the acceptance of the United States invitation to the test, there were some doubts about the usefulness of the attendance of members of the Canadian Section of the PJBD but that it was finally decided that they should go for the sake of good relations with their American colleagues. We learned in the course of the journey that the United Kingdom Government had had similar doubts and had come to the same conclusion.

16. In the light of our experience, it was the opinion of both the Canadian and U.K. observers that both Governments made the correct decision in sending senior representatives and that if this had not been done it would have been interpreted by the United States authorities as indicative of a lack of desire on our part for closer relations in this field. The U.S. officials at the Proving Ground repeatedly expressed the view that the limitation on cooperation imposed by their Atomic Energy Act had been undesirable; that our presence at the tests marked the first step in implementing the Canadian and British bilateral military atomic agreements; and that in future there should be a much more fruitful exchange of information within the terms of the bilateral agreements. Nevertheless, security remains very much of a preoccupation with U.S. atomic energy officials. We all had to read a lengthy security document and sign an undertaking not to discuss what we had seen except with persons properly cleared and with a "need-to-know". The "need-to-know" criterion is applied very strictly, even to senior U.S. officers on the test force, and the information at their disposal is very narrowly compartmentalized. It is because of the undertaking we gave that this report has been so highly classified.

17. In concluding this report a comment on the question of future United States thermonuclear tests may be of interest to the Department of External Affairs. There is every evidence, both from the nature of the programme and the effort being made to build up semi-permanent facilities, that so far as the AEC and the Defence Department are concerned, testing will continue throughout the foreseeable future. This was born out by a conversation we had with the chief scientist of the project. He said, however, that in his opinion the current test series would bring to an end the period during which genuinely new scientific data have been obtained. The consequence of this would be an increasing difficulty in recruiting competent scientists for future tests. He added that unfortunately the only true scientist on the Commission, Dr. von Neumann, was dying of cancer, and the significance of this development would be lost on his colleagues.

JAMES BAY BOMBING RANGE

DOCUMENT NO. D-20-56 [Ottawa], September 26, 1956

ESTABLISHMENT OF A BOMBING RANGE IN JAMES BAY FOR USE BY THE UNITED STATES AIR FORCE STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND

1. With the important object of improving the effectiveness of the Canadian air defence system, particularly with respect to electronic countermeasures and aircraft interceptions, the RCAF desires that the United States Air Force Strategic Air Command be encouraged to route more of its training flights through the main air defence area in Canada, thus gaining two major benefits for the RCAF. Firstly, this is by far the most economic means whereby the entire air defence system can be effectively exercised against modern bombers under realistic operating conditions. Secondly, because the RCAF possesses only limited Electronic Countermeasures training capability, the operation by Strategic Air Command aircraft of Electronic Countermeasures equipment provides urgently required training to RCAF fighter aircrew and ground control radar operators.

2. Strategic Air Command training flights are organized to provide maximum training for all crew members. Accordingly, by preference they are routed through areas containing a radar bomb scoring unit, counter Electronic Counter-measures, interceptor squadrons, aircraft control and warning units, bombing and gunnery ranges. Consequently, to encourage Strategic Air Command to schedule more of its training flights through Canada, it is desired to make available for Strategic Air Command use a bombing and gunnery range. For both the RCAF and Strategic Air Command the best location for this facility is in the James Bay area.

3. The RCAF, in consultation with other Government Departments, has selected an isolated and uninhabited water area in James Bay, under Federal Jurisdiction, bounded by 50°32'N, 79°40'W, 80°20'W, which will be suitable for a range. The range will not require to be manned and needs only the erection of a simple radar reflector target on a small uninhabited island, the only island in the range area, and the erection thereon of warning notices; all at negligible cost. The range area required is 25 x 50 miles in which high altitude practice bombing can be carried out by radar or visual bomb sighting, employing photo-flash practice bombs or concrete filled practice bombs containing a small powder charge for spotting. The firing of .5" and 20 millimeter aircraft guns within the area is included in order that all members of the bomber crew are exercised in their duties on each flight.

4. Coincident with the establishment of this training facility it will be necessary to amend existing regulations governing the clearance of United States Strategic Air Command training flights over Canadian territory. Accordingly, it is recommended that Appendix "A" to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence Journal of Jan 1955, para (e) of Part I Section I (as approved by Cabinet Defence Committee at its 101st Meeting on Nov 12, 1954), be amended as per the underlined portions of the attached draft to include authority for dropping of practice bombs, photo-flash bombs, and air-to-air firing; employing only inert materials (non-Atomic).

Recommendation

5. The Chiefs of Staff recommend, and I concur, that the RCAF be granted permission to establish a bombing and air firing range in James Bay to support training flights by the United States Strategic Air Command over Canada.[94]

SOUND SURVEILLANCE SITE SURVEYS

As you may know there is at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, a joint R.C.N.-U.S.N. sound surveillance station, and the Cabinet Defence Committee has approved (on September 27, 1955) the negotiation of an agreement with the United States for the construction of two additional stations, one in the Cape Canso area of Nova Scotia and the other near Windsor Harbour on Vancouver Island, roughly in accordance with the conditions governing the establishment and operation of the station at Shelburne.[95]

2. The negotiation of this agreement was undertaken but has been in abeyance for a year for technical reasons. Meanwhile the two Navies have continued with a programme of hydrographic and other surveys designed to collect the data necessary for the establishment of the stations. A necessary preliminary to such surveys is the establishment of navigational aids on shore by which the survey ships can fix their positions.

3. The attached Note No. 246 of April 23, 1957† from the U.S. Embassy requests permission for the U.S.N., in co-ordination with the R.C.N., to conduct on-site surveys in the vicinity of Estevan Point, Vancouver Island, designed to find suitable locations for the establishment of LORAC (navigational aid) stations for use in connection with proposed hydrographic operations this summer under Project Caesar (the establishment of the two proposed stations). The attached Note granting this request has been prepared for your signature, if you agree, in consultation with the Departments of National Defence and Transport.

4. The R.C.N. and U.S.N. have been rather slack in initiating the submission by the U.S. Embassy of diplomatic requests for this and previous surveys in the same series. In this case the R.C.N. attempted to persuade Mr. Macdonnell after working hours last Thursday to authorize informally the commencement of the surveys on Monday, April 22, subject to the subsequent submission of a diplomatic request. Mr. Macdonnell insisted however that the surveys be properly approved before they began. As a result, the present proposal of the U.S.N., as mentioned in our Note† is for the surveys to commence on Monday, April 29. We should therefore like, if possible, to give our Note to the U.S. Embassy today or tomorrow.

5. You will note that paragraph 4 of our Note in effect turns down the request for blanket permission for similar surveys which may or may not be necessary on the west coast of Vancouver Island between now and the summer of 1958. I consider that the granting of such an indefinite request would be undesirable in the light of the past slackness to which I have referred above and of the present state of public opinion with respect to our general relations with the United States. Furthermore, I think it would simply be bad practice.

SOUND SURVEILLANCE SURVEYS

You asked me to let you have a memorandum on this subject in connection with your intention to call in Mr. Tyler Thompson.

2. The attached papers† contain the background up to the point at which I consulted you yesterday afternoon. As I told you then, the RCN had just received from the USN a copy of a message† containing the itinerary of the USS Requisite for the on-site surveys supposedly authorized by our Note No. DL 87 of April 25, 1957 (flagged). That Note authorizes the carrying out of "on-site surveys in the vicinity of Estevan Point, Vancouver Island", and specifically states in paragraph 4 that, if any other surveys are to be carried out on the West coast of Vancouver Island, requests specifying the proposed dates and places of such surveys should be submitted several weeks in advance through diplomatic channels.

3. Despite this, the instructions which have been issued to the USS Requisite by the USN are to undertake surveys at 7 points on the West coast of Vancouver Island, commencing today, May 1. These points extend for a distance of approximately 130 miles, i.e. 65 miles on either side of Estevan Point, and cover almost exactly half of the length of Vancouver Island. It is, I think, — and the RCN agrees on this — impossible to interpret "in the vicinity of Estevan Point" as meaning half the coastline.

4. In the light of what has happened, you could, I think, make the following points to Mr. Thompson:

(a) the events leading up to our Note No. DL 87 demonstrate once more the desirability of diplomatic authority for defence projects being sought in adequate time — while our Note was prepared with the greatest possible speed, the original schedule of the USS Requisite had to be delayed a week until our Note was ready.

(b) in our view, the surveys about to be undertaken by the USS Requisite are not authorized by our Note No. DL 87, except for the one in the immediate area of Estevan Point; while we are not proposing to hold up these on-site surveys, or to require the submission of a further diplomatic request for them, we wish the US authorities to know that we do not think they were properly authorized; in any case, as stated in paragraph 3 (d) of Note No. DL 87, we wish any requests, resulting from these surveys, for permission to establish LORAC stations or to conduct other operations, such as topographic or hydrographic surveys, or the laying of cables, to be the subject of a diplomatic note.[96]

5. I should perhaps remind you that, while in the above case the USN and possibly the State Department are the ones who have been at fault, the record of the RCN with respect to obtaining diplomatic authority for joint RCN-USN sound surveillance operations, has not been too good. Our letter of April 25† to Mr. Rewinkel was necessitated by the failure of the RCN to inform the USN of our requirement that authority for the establishment of the EPI station at Lance Point, Newfoundland, should be sought in a diplomatic note. And your letter of April 26† to Mr. Miller was in effect a refusal to agree with the desire of the RCN for the use of the stations authorized in our Note No. 254 of November 7, 1955, to be extended without the proper diplomatic authority.

U.S. SURPLUS DISPOSAL PROGRAMME FOR WHEAT; LETTER TO PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

23. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that United States officials intended to extend the scope of their wheat surplus disposal programme. They were now negotiating a contract with France involving the sale of U.S. wheat to be financed with the payment for certain defence installations. Moreover, an announcement had been made that the U.S. government was prepared to subsidize sales of agricultural products to Poland. These arrangements, added to the already large programme of government-assisted sales, were bound to produce a most difficult situation for Canadian wheat producers.

24. The Prime Minister referred to his meeting with the U.S. President in Augusta, last December.[97] Mr. Eisenhower had then stated that the prosperity of the U.S. and Canada were intimately linked and that government policies should take this interdependence into account. Mr. St-Laurent suggested that he might take this opportunity to write to Mr. Eisenhower, who probably did not have a personal knowledge of the recent developments, regarding the disposal of wheat on the international market and its undesirable impact on the Canadian economy.

25. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the expanding scope of the U.S. wheat surplus disposal programme and agreed that a letter on the matter might be sent to President Eisenhower by the Prime Minister if he and the Minister of Trade and Commerce came to the conclusion that such a move would be helpful.

My dear Governor [Adams]:

I am enclosing a personal letter for the President which I do not wish to have any official character but which is along lines of the very pleasant talks I had with him in Augusta a few weeks ago when he was kind enough to provide me with a very enjoyable and memorable half-day with him.

I would be obliged to you if you would pass it on to him and tell him that it requires no reply because I think I appreciate the situation, with which it deals, well enough to be satisfied with having it come to his attention for such personal reactions to it as circumstances may permit.

With warm personal regards to you and very best wishes always,

Yours sincerely,

Le premier ministre

Prime Minister to President of United States

PERSONAL Ottawa, January 11, 1957

Dear Mr. President:

I have such happy recollections of that pleasant half-day you were kind enough to let me have with you in Augusta a few weeks ago that I am venturing to write you this personal letter about a matter that has been giving me much concern.

I came away with the impression that you felt as I did, that the prosperity of your great country was quite intimately linked with that of our much less prosperous but rapidly-developing Canada. Though we are, of course, much more dependent upon what happens in the United States than your people are upon what happens up here, we nevertheless, on both sides of the line, have a better economic climate ourselves when that of the other country is also good.

It is natural and perhaps inevitable that certain things are done in some branches of our respective administrations that you and I do not always know about personally and do not always fit in with our own ideas of what might be best for both countries. I am so grateful to you for what you have done in the past that I am venturing to bring to your attention a situation which I hope will prove an occasion for further gratitude.

For several months now there has been growing concern in Canada about the impact of United States surplus disposal activities upon the position of our western wheat producers.

You may recall that, when the present surplus disposal programme was launched, you gave certain assurances that this programme would be administered in such a way as to avoid damage to the interests of friendly countries. These assurances were repeated from time to time by other United States officials and I believe that some of the laws relating to the matter contain safeguarding provisions along these lines. Nevertheless, in many cases the surplus disposal activities of the United States are causing definite and serious injury to Canadian wheat producers.

This matter was raised by Mr. C.D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, at the last meeting of the Joint United States-Canada Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs held in September 1955.[98] As a result of what was said by Mr. Howe, Mr. Benson arranged for officials of our two Governments to meet from time to time. These meetings have provided for useful exchange of views and there were occasions, I am told, when the policies of our respective countries were reconsidered in the light of what was said. The record, however, shows that the pace of U.S. surplus disposal of wheat has been stepped up rather than moderated since Mr. Howe first raised the matter with Mr. Benson.

The result is that the Canadian wheat producer, who is not subsidized, feels that he is being steadily squeezed out of markets by U.S. surpluses which are heavily subsidized or sold on non-commercial terms at the expense of your Treasury.

I know that the farm surplus problem is an extremely difficult one for you and your Administration, as it is for us. I know too that you are endeavouring to find a permanent solution that will avoid the recurrence of embarrassing surpluses. I am taking the liberty, therefore, of bringing to your attention what I am sure is an unintended result of the present activities of some of the United States agencies.

The main reason for this injury is the magnitude of the U.S. surplus disposal programme for wheat. In one way or another, through subsidy, through sales for local currency, through tied-sales guaranteeing a proportion of future wheat markets to the United States, through barter arrangements and otherwise, your wheat is being made so attractive to importing countries that they reduce their purchases from Canada and other exporting countries, which cannot afford to subsidize on such a tremendous scale.

As an indication of the extending scope of these surplus disposal activities, your people are now, I am informed, negotiating a most extraordinary contract involving the sale of United States wheat connected in some way with the payment for certain defence installations in France. Just the other day an announcement was made that the United States is prepared to subsidize sales of agricultural products to Poland. These extensions of your surplus disposal activities, when added to the already large programme of government-assisted sales, are bound to produce an even more difficult situation for our wheat producers.

I would not ask you personally to look into the details of these operations but perhaps, if you had Mr. Gabriel Hauge do so, he could give you accurate picture of their probable repercussions. If you then felt that my concern is not unwarranted perhaps a word from the White House to your side of the United States-Canada Committee of officials, who discuss together trade and economic affairs, would assist in avoiding consequences which, I am sure, are not intended and could be quite harmful to our common prosperity.

With renewed thanks for your kind hospitality to my son and daughter and me in Augusta and warmest personal regards.

Yours most sincerely,
LOUIS S. ST-LAURENT

Washington, January 15, 1957

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I acknowledge with appreciation your letter of January 11th with which was enclosed the communication directed to the President. These letters were handed to me by your Ambassador, Mr. A.D.P. Heeney, and I agreed with him on the following course of action:

(1) A review of the transactions involving the foreign sale of wheat made during the last year and those contemplated to be made this year will be immediately undertaken.

(2) The concern you express about the policy of this government with respect to these transactions will be made known to the President.

(3) A response to you will be seasonably transmitted through your Ambassador.

May I say that the President was most happy about his visit with you in Augusta recently and would, if he were here, wish me to convey his personal regards and felicitations.

It is my hope that this year will bring you success and reward in your undertakings.

Sincerely,

[Ottawa, February 1, 1957]

Dear Mr. Heeney:

I have carefully noted your communications† arising out of the Prime Minister's personal letter to the President on U.S. surplus disposal. You anticipate that you might be asked to present the Canadian position in greater detail, perhaps to Gabriel Hauge.

I welcome the indication that the Administration will undertake a complete review of their program, past and future. Ambassador Merchant paid us a call recently in the course of which I plainly indicated the gravity with which the Canadian Government views the effects on Canada of the U.S. disposal policy.

The notes you sent by telegram (No. 184†) on January 17th, are very good. It may be, however, that our further representations will have to take a quite different form and with that in view I have had Mitchell Sharp prepare the attached memorandum. You are free to use this as you see fit either above or to supplement the notes you sent by telegram. One important point is covered in Mr. Sharp's memorandum which is arising from yours, namely the flour subsidy.

You may decide that it is advisable for you to take the initiative in clarifying the Canadian position with Hauge or some other official. On the other hand you may be called by the Americans. Whatever develops and you believe it would be helpful, I could arrange to have Mr. Sharp go to Washington on 24 hours notice.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum

THE EFFECT ON CANADA OF U.S. SURPLUS WHEAT DISPOSAL POLICIES AND PROGRAMMES

In reply to the Prime Minister's letter, the United States Department of Agriculture can be expected to defend their surplus disposal activities. They will probably contend inter alia that:

(1) Subsidization of U.S. exports is necessary to bring their high domestic prices into line with world prices and that they are following rather than making the world market level.

(2) Sales for local currency are offered only to countries that cannot afford to pay in dollars, that these sales represent an addition to total demand and that they do not replace normal commercial sales of Canada or of any other country, including the United States.

(3) "Tied sales", whereby countries in receipt of wheat under PL 480 guarantee to buy stated quantities from the United States, are required to implement the terms of PL 480 and are not for amounts in excess of what can be considered normal U.S. sales to those countries.

(4) There are no special inducements to engage in barter transactions.

(5) Apart from additional exports to countries which are able to take additional wheat because they can pay in local currency, the U.S. is obtaining only a fair share of total import demand.

(6) Canada is obtaining a fair share of total import demand on the basis of past experience.

We do not accept any of these statements as valid. In brief, our counter-contentions are as follows with respect to each of the foregoing points:

1. Subsidization of exports is undoubtedly necessary, given U.S. domestic wheat supports. The rates of subsidy paid on the various grades of wheat are such, however, that United States wheat has become so cheap that it is displacing Canadian wheat in traditional Canadian markets. It is the degree of subsidy, quite apart from other forms of export programmes, which is now causing increasing disruption to the world price level and favouring the purchase by importers of U.S. wheat. The Canadian Wheat Board has followed a policy of stabilizing the market by holding prices of Canadian wheat steady (The price of Number One Northern wheat in store at Ft. William or Vancouver is not lower than it was 2 1/2 years ago). On the other hand, for example, U.S. One Hard Winter wheat is now being offered in the United Kingdom for the equivalent of 26 cents per bushel below Canadian No. 1 Northern, whereas just a year ago, the difference was 15 cents per bushel. High subsidies, amounting to 88 to 92 cents per bushel are being paid on U.S. Dark Northern Springs, for shipment from the Pacific Coast, with the result that this grade of U.S. wheat is now being sold in Japan which formerly took almost all its hard spring wheats from Canada.

U.S. flour millers are in an especially advantageous position because of the basis on which subsidies are paid to them. In effect there is a higher subsidy on flour exports than on wheat exports. Canadian millers pay exactly the same prices as any other buyer for Canadian wheat. As a result not only are Canadian millers compelled to meet the competition arising from the generally lower level of U.S. wheat prices on world markets but they must also attempt to compete with U.S. mills which receive an additional subsidy on flour exports. Needless to say Canadian millers are coming off very much a second best in this unequal struggle. They have lost traditional markets, particularly in the Caribbean areas and South America, and stand to suffer even greater losses in the Philippines and elsewhere.

2. The declared purpose of sales for local currencies is to dispose of surpluses to countries which cannot pay dollars. There is no way of determining exactly how much cash any particular country is prepared to pay for an essential foodstuff like wheat. Experience shows that wheat will always have a high degree of priority in competing claims for scarce dollars.

Sales for local currency are therefore bound to reduce commercial sales to some degree.

Canada's complaint, however, does not rest upon this incidental and unavoidable reduction of commercial markets. It is directed against the vigour with which the U.S. has been pushing this phase of its programme. The impression we have gained is that this programme is not being administered primarily for the benefit of the recipient country but mainly, if not entirely, as a means of disposing of United States surpluses. By contrast, countries in receipt of aid from Canada under the Colombo Plan are given their choice among the products available in Canada; they receive wheat only if that is the product on which they wish to spend the aid offered.

So great is the quantity of wheat being disposed of under PL 480 that many of the recipient countries (e.g. Brazil and India) will find it difficult to absorb the quantities available and will not be in the market for wheat from any other country to which they are not already committed.

Canada believes that most of the sales of U.S.A. wheat for local currency to Latin American countries could have been made on a commercial basis. Colombia is a particular example. Canada could have sold substantially more wheat to France, Greece, Finland, Turkey, Ecuador, Portugal and Israel if these countries had not been able to obtain wheat for local currency under Title 1 of Public Law 480, or under Section 402 of the Mutual Security Act. Portugal and Turkey are examples of countries which had short crops and to which Canada could logically expect to sell, were it not for U.S. sales in local currency.

In the case of the U.S. agreement with Brazil, Canada considers that this is likely to reduce the amount that the Argentine could have marketed to Brazil and consequently force Argentina to sell more to Europe in direct competition with Canada.

3. "Tied Sales" are in our view directly opposed to the multilateral principles to which both Canada and the U.S. adhere. They mean that the U.S. obtains not only what the U.S. considers to be a normal share of the commercial market but in addition, of course, the much larger share represented by the sale for local currency. We do not accept the interpretation that guaranteed sales of U.S. wheat are necessary to implement the direction of PL 480 to take "reasonable precautions to safeguard the usual marketings of the United States". A commercial quota open to competition among all exporters would, in our view, be equally acceptable.

4. We cannot believe that there are no special inducements to engage in barter transactions involving wheat. Our trade reports are to the contrary. U.S. wheat purchased under barter arrangements is being offered in markets such as the United Kingdom, Western Germany, Belgium and Japan at prices even lower than those resulting from the payment of ordinary subsidies.

5. and 6. Anything can be proved by statistics as to what should be the normal proportion of export markets enjoyed by Canada and the United States. Pre-war figures give the United States a very small share; post-war figures a larger share. The U.S. likes to use the period immediately following the war when Canadian stocks were low and crops moderate and the U.S. with abundant supplies was able to capture a high proportion of the very high demand then existing. This is not a proper basis of comparison in our view.

This statistical argument is fruitless. Our point is that United States producers would not, if they did not have the vast resources of the U.S. Treasury at their disposal, be able to capture and hold as high a proportion of world markets as at present. The U.S. Government is in other words, pushing a part of its own surplus problems on to the shoulders of the Canadian producer and to the detriment of the Canadian economy. The U.S. is at least as well able to hold stocks as is Canada. We are prepared to hold stocks. We believe that the present situation of excessive crops in North America will pass — either as a result of natural causes, or as a result of positive curtailment of output. We do not think it is fair that the Canadian producer should in the interim have to bear an excessive part of the burden.

In brief, we are not arguing against any specific part of the U.S. surplus disposal programme. Our contention is simply that the United States is pushing every phase of its disposal programme to the point where it is causing real and serious injury to the citizens of a good neighbour and without any offsetting gain in other directions. Not only so, but we believe that the cost to the U.S. Treasury will be lower if greater moderation is used. Specifically we urge:

(1) A reduction in export subsidy rates so that the price at which U.S. wheat is offered abroad will be in line with world prices rather than constituting a continual price depressant.

(2) Such action as will ensure that the price of wheat for the export of flour is identical to that at which wheat is exported, thereby eliminating the additional price advantage which the U.S. flour milling industry presently enjoys.

(3) Re-examination of the provision under Title 1 — P.L. 480 requiring "reasonable precautions to safeguard the usual marketings of the U.S.A." with a view to eliminating from future agreements any requirement that countries obtaining wheat for local currency undertake to purchase a specified quantity of U.S. wheat for dollars.

(4) Restraint in providing countries with wheat for local currency so as to minimize the degree to which such sales are bound to reduce commercial sales.

(5) Elimination of the direct injury to other exporters and disruption to the market caused by offerings of wheat obtained under barter arrangements.

USA AGRICULTURAL SURPLUS DISPOSAL ACTIVITIES

Sherman Adams, the Assistant to the President, invited me to see him at the White House this morning. He had Gabriel Hauge, the President's Economic Adviser, with him. The purpose was to discuss the reply to be sent from the President to the Prime Minister, following the review by the White House which had been agreed upon in response to Mr. St. Laurent's letter to Mr. Eisenhower of January 11.

2. Adams began by saying that the White House had now completed the review of transactions involving the foreign sale of wheat, past and contemplated, and a written reply would now go forward to the Prime Minister. This would necessarily be in general terms but he wished to convey to me, orally, some of the particular results of their investigation, for our own confidential info and guidance. The review had been conducted by Hauge who would tell me what he had discovered.

3. Hauge said that he had gone into the facts of past transactions and the prospects for future transactions with officials of the agencies concerned (principally Agriculture and State). In his opinion this had been a useful exercise, from the Administration's point of view, as well as in the Canadian interest. With the size and complexities of the USA administrative machine, it was impossible for the White House to be aware at all times of what was surpluses, and concurrently to institute policies which would prevent further excessive accumulations. The fact that this year the agriculture budget amounted to $5 billion was evidence that the USA were "not sparing (their) own horses" in their efforts to solve this very stubborn problem. It was not only other countries that felt the impact of their efforts at surplus disposal.

5. With regard to means and methods employed by the USA in individual wheat transactions, Hauge admitted, frankly, that his investigations had revealed that, under congressional pressure, things had been done which would jeopardize and damage commercial marketings. These affected USA as well as Canadian sales, for we had common interest in maintaining the dollar market for wheat. In this connection Hauge referred particularly to the deals with Colombia and Portugal.

6. With regard to the French barter deal, Hauge's review of the facts led him to agree that the results could be damaging to Canadian (and USA) commercial transactions, though not precisely in the way indicated in the Prime Minister's letter. The conditions of this agreement might well lead to the displacement of commercial wheat in countries where the American company dealing with the CCC delivered its grain or other commodities acquired from the corporation. The Administration would see what could be done to avoid the most serious consequences of this operation which, incidentally was authorized not under Public Law 480 but by special legislation (PL 698).

7. With regard to the future, Hauge said that the present tendency was to seek outlets for surplus wheat in the underdeveloped countries and those without dollar resources. Here the effect upon the Canadian position would be less harmful.

8. Speaking of prospects in the satellite countries, Hauge expressed the view that economic as well as political factors were not now favourable. The USSR appeared to be in a better position to provide for the needs of their Eastern European allies and there were political as well as legal barriers in the way of the USA giving aid to Communist régimes. Concerning Poland, in particular, where, as a matter of policy, we might both wish to reduce reliance on the USSR, what means were open to the USA? For a barter deal, what had the Poles to offer in return? For a transaction under PL 480, the Poles were committed to accept no aid "with strings attached", but the USA law required just such strings. In general, Hauge concluded that there were no USA deals imminent of the kind of which we complained because of present and prospective circumstances, political as well as economic.

9. At my suggestion, Hauge agreed to elaborate further upon the results of his investigation with Ritchie and Hopper and I am arranging for an appointment with him for this purpose, next week.

10. In connection with our difficulties over wheat marketing, Hauge enquired whether we were thinking of an early meeting of the Joint Economic Committee. When I replied that we had not thought that such a meeting would be likely to be particularly useful at this time, he expressed the view that the Committee should meet at least once a year if it were to remain alive. It is a mechanism to which Hauge at least attaches considerable importance.

11. When Hauge had concluded his review, Adams said that he wanted us to know that the President had taken a real personal interest in our problem. He had discussed the Prime Minister's letter at some length and had given instructions that, in this matter, the USA should so far as possible avoid courses which interferred with Canadian trade. The USA should behave as the good neighbours that they were with Canada and conduct their disposal operations with this in mind. The President's wishes in this respect had been communicated to the departments and officials concerned.

12. Finally, Adams showed me the draft reply which had been prepared to the Prime Minister's letter to the President. This seemed to me satisfactory from our point of view. It is now to be submitted to the President for signature and delivered to me to be forwarded to Mr. St. Laurent. When I receive it I will send it forward by telegram. It is understood that for the present at all events Mr. St. Laurent's letter and Mr. Eisenhower's reply will not, repeat not, be made public. If it is desired to make any public reference to the fact that the Prime Minister has been in communication with the President, on this subject, I feel that we should make quite sure to concert, in advance, with the White House.

13. There is no doubt in my mind that the White House have gone seriously into these problems of USA wheat disposal policies and practices, with the Canadian interest in mind. What the results will be it is difficult to forecast, but we can at least be certain that the desire and direction of the President that USA agencies conduct themselves, under their law, so as to cause least harm to our interests should now be well known to them.

14. We will be reporting to you again after our talk next week with Gabriel Hauge.

15. Please deliver copies of this message, as soon as possible, to Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Howe.

Washington, February 5, 1957

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Since Governor Adams' letter to you of January fifteenth, he has proceeded with the course of action there outlined to evaluate for me the problem about which you wrote to me concerning the impact of our surplus disposal program on your western wheat producers. An oral report has been given to your Ambassador here for transmittal to you.

A review of the transactions involving our foreign sales of wheat last year and those projected for this year has been made and has been discussed with me. In turn, I have given instructions to communicate my deep concern in the matter to United States representatives who participate with Canadian officials in periodic conferences on wheat export problems. In addition, my recognition of the complex nature of this problem is being brought to the attention of our Council on Foreign Economic Policy.

Needless to say, I am keenly interested in working toward our essential goals in this field with the fullest possible consideration of its impact on Canada. It may be unreasonable to hope that disagreement will be eliminated from all areas in which Canada is affected by our emergency surplus disposal program, but I want you to know that it is the intention of all of us here to reduce to a minimum the points at which our respective interests diverge.

We shall continue to keep your representatives informed through normal channels of developments in our surplus disposal program and will, I assure you, be prepared to review with Canadian officials those aspects of our policy which appear to jeopardize Canadian interests.

Sincerely,
DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER

USA WHEAT DISPOSAL

I am now proposing to see Hauge for about half an hour after 3 o'clock this Friday afternoon with Ritchie and Hopper. Since there will not be much time for discussion, and since Hauge himself will be going away from Washington almost immediately for a week or so, I would propose to leave with him informally a slightly edited version of the very useful memo on "The effect on Canada of USA surplus wheat disposal policies and programmes", which Mr. Howe sent to me with his letter of February 1. This memo seems to me to make very effectively the points which I would wish to register with Hauge. If they are given to him on paper, he may have a chance to study them while he is away, and would have something on which he could get other officials to do some reflecting during his absence.

2. I do not think it necessary for Mr. Sharp to come down to Washington for this conversation on Friday, although it may very well be desirable for him to join with us in following up this subject later when Hauge and the other officials concerned will have had time to consider our arguments.

3. In view of the considerable latitude given to me in Mr. Howe's letter, I am making a few editorial changes in the memo, and, in particular, I am redrafting the third subpara, section 2, along the following lines: "While the effects of these local-currency sales on commercial exports of wheat may be somewhat less when the sales are made to underdeveloped countries than is the case when they are made to the larger importing countries, such transactions may have additional unfortunate consequences when directed at underdeveloped areas; in particular they may tend to cast doubt on the motives behind, and the usefulness of, the general programmes of the USA, Canada and other Western countries aimed at helping those areas to make more rapid progress in developing their economies. The USA surplus disposal programme is being pushed with such vigour in the underdeveloped countries and elsewhere that the impression is becoming rather widespread that this programme is not being administered primarily for the benefit of the recipient country, but mainly, if not entirely as a means of disposing of USA surpluses. By contrast, countries in receipt of aid from Canada under the Colombo Plan are given their choice among the products available in Canada; they receive wheat only if that is the product on which they wish to spend the aid offered, and in fact they have been [generally][99] supplied with wheat from Canada only in exceptional cases where they were confronted with a famine or at least a very serious food shortage."

4. If you have any different views, I should be grateful to receive them by immediate telegram in view of the shortness of time. If I do not hear from you, I shall go ahead along the lines indicated above.[100]

5. Incidentally, I would not propose to give copies of the proposed memo to the State Department or to the Department of Agriculture, in view of its informal character and since I think it might have more effect if it reaches them through Hauge's office.

USA WHEAT SURPLUS DISPOSAL ACTIVITIES

Ritchie, Hopper and I called on Hauge in the White House Executive Office this afternoon and left with him the memo referred to in my earlier message. I said that we would be happy to discuss the subject with him or with anyone whom he might designate after he had an opportunity to read the memo. I did not attempt to take him through the arguments in the paper, but merely mentioned the main points discussed in it.

2. Without commenting on the substance of the paper, Hauge remarked that he thought it was very useful to have this kind of subject brought up at least in general terms for consideration within the White House Office. He and his associates in the Executive Office could not attempt to administer the surplus disposal programme or even to keep in touch with all of the details. It was nevertheless desirable that they should examine any substantial problem which arose with a view to ensuring that the President's wishes were being fully carried out. Even with the best will in the world, the various departments and agencies in a bureaucracy as large as that in Washington would almost inevitably do things occasionally which did not reflect the real intentions of the President. He was not, I am sure, intending to imply that the surplus disposal programmes were necessarily in conflict with the President's desires but was merely indicating that the memo which we had given him would be studied by himself and others in the light of the President's own general views on the subject. I have no doubt that after this study, we shall be invited to discuss the matter further with Hauge.

3. Hauge referred to the meetings of USA-Canadian officials concerned with wheat marketing and said he had the impression that at the beginning of the latest meeting our representatives were somewhat doubtful concerning the value of those discussions. He gathered that as that meeting progressed our people may have somewhat changed their views concerning its usefulness. He implied (as the President's letter to the Prime Minister also intimates) that these periodic conferences on wheat export problems could continue to serve a useful purpose.

4. There was also some talk about a further meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee if that body was going to continue in existence. Hauge agreed that the future of the Committee and the timing of any further meeting might be discussed sometime after mid-summer.

WHEAT FOR POLAND

When we were with Kalijarvi this morning, in connection with potatoes, he raised with us the question of a possible joint operation for supplying wheat to Poland. He said that they were nearing the end of the negotiations on the rest of the package but the Poles were showing some dissatisfaction with the contents. They were somewhat concerned about their wheat requirements and were likely to continue pressing for the inclusion of some wheat. Kalijarvi assured us that the USA side were still proceeding on the assumption that no wheat would be provided by the USA unilaterally to Poland.

2. We took advantage of Kalijarvi's enquiry to emphasize how troubled we had been by Secretary Benson's remarks about Eastern European markets and by the inconsistency between those views and the assurances concerning USA intentions or motives which had been given by a State Department representative at the meeting of officials. We also let Kalijarvi know how serious we thought the wheat marketing situation had become and how discouraged we were by the attitudes displayed at Monday's meeting.

3. We recalled that the possibility which Kalijarvi mentioned had been referred to rather vaguely during the recent wheat talks. We did not know what chance there was of some such arrangement being worked out but we undertook to get a reaction from you. We pointed out that so far Canada had been selling wheat to Poland on commercial terms with the government (or the export credits insurance corporation) merely guaranteeing credits arranged by the Poles privately. We did not know what the prospect was for combining this sort of approach with the methods indulged in by the USA of or our adopting a different approach as part of a joint USA-Canadian arrangement.

4. Kalijarvi stressed that his question was necessarily somewhat hypothetical since he could not be sure that the Poles would press strongly for wheat or that the USA would be willing and able to accede to an insistent request, even if action could be concerted with Canada. He also recognized that any arrangement for joint supply would require a good deal of working out. Even their own thoughts were nebulous. What they would like to know, however, is whether if the matter became active you would be prepared to consider and discuss the possibility.

USA POLISH AID NEGOTIATIONS

This afternoon we were invited by John Leddy in the State Department to call on him and Clarence Nichols of the International Trade and Resources Division in order to hear what had been happening over the past two days in the economic talks with the Poles and to learn more of what the USA had in mind in suggesting the possibility of some joint operation relating to wheat.

2. According to Leddy, the USA offer, along the lines reported in our earlier telegram, was not well received by the Poles. They were not too pleased with the commodity composition of the offer and they were dissatisfied with the prices charged on the goods offered under PL480 (which were current domestic prices rather than the lower export prices). They also did not like the fact that, in order to take advantage of the CCC credit portion of the offer, they would have to make arrangements with West German intermediaries since USA exporters could not or would not take the risks involved in supplying goods directly to Poland on the basis of credits extended to them by the CCC.

3. After reacting to the USA offer in this manner on Monday, the Poles came back with a counter-proposal of their own on Tuesday. According to Leddy, the following were the main elements in the Polish counter-suggestion:

(a) The aid to be provided under PL480 or indirectly through the EX-IM Bank should amount to about 80 million dollars plus an additional 10 or 15 million dollars towards transport and handling costs.

(b) The goods to be supplied should be priced at export prices.

(c) The programme should include the following commodities: 50,000 tons of cotton (representing the expected import deficiency in 1957 and half of the desired reserve); 500,000 tons of wheat (representing half of the stockpile which the Poles have said would be necessary in order to enable them to adopt more liberal agricultural policies and do away with compulsory deliveries); 10 million dollars worth of fats and oils and a small quantity of machinery for agriculture and coal mining.

4. Apparently the credit terms expected by the Poles for the bulk of the programme would involve a five-year period of grace and scheduled repurchases of zloties with dollars thereafter for a period which might run for as long as thirty-five years.

5. Leddy intimated that in addition the CCC might possibly provide credit facilities to USA exporters who would be prepared to supply commodities from the CCC's inventories directly to Poland. This would be a matter to be worked out largely between individual exporters and the Polish authorities. Under present CCC policies, such credit to USA exporters is not available for wheat although there is apparently nothing in the legislation which would prevent the CCC from applying the system to wheat if that was considered advisable. There was no suggestion, however, that the CCC was thinking of making these facilities available for wheat.

6. In connection with the wheat component in the programme which the USA government was now considering, Leddy and Nichols emphasized that it had been put in by the Poles and not by the USA and that, insofar as it was being viewed favourably within the USA negotiating team, it was being supported by the State Department on political grounds rather than by Agriculture on commercial or surplus-disposal grounds. They said that Agriculture in fact had scarcely mentioned wheat during the interdepartmental talks so far. Leddy also stressed that the programme suggested by the Poles had not by any means been accepted yet by the USA Administration. Acceptance of it would require decisions at the highest level including a decision to shift funds from other programmes now under negotiation or virtually to encumber funds not yet appropriated. Before seeking any such decision the State Department was anxious to have our views on the suggestion concerning wheat. They would like to know (a) Whether we would be prepared to provide all or part of this quantity of wheat on some basis which the Poles could accept in their present financial situation (Nichols said that if we were willing to take this on he did not think anyone here would mind since their main objective was, as stated earlier, to get wheat into Poland for essentially political reasons), (b) If we would not be willing to meet all or part of this Polish requirement, what would our attitude be towards the USA meeting it?

7. Nichols recalled that during the recent wheat talks some mention had been made of the possibility of securing an assurance from the Poles that if they were provided with wheat for stockpiling purposes they would not let this interfere with their normal volume of commercial imports. He said he doubted that such an assurance would have much meaning. He also noted that, in appearances at least, it might seem to guarantee the Soviets their present position in the Polish market, which would not of course be desirable from a USA point of view. He assumed that we would not expect the USA to exact an undertaking with respect to imports from Canada alone. He also observed that the imposition of formal restrictions on the use of the stockpile might defeat the purpose which the Poles had in mind, since they might not then seem able to use, or threaten to use, their wheat reserves sufficiently freely to persuade the peasants to increase their own production and refrain from hoarding.

8. We said that we did not of course know whether the quantity of wheat now sought by the Poles was necessary in order to permit them to liberalize their agricultural policies or whether, if it were to be supplied, it would necessarily result in such a liberalization. This was a matter on which opinions might differ. We had no doubt that Canada shared the same interest as the USA in encouraging recent political tendencies in Poland. We added that it would be less difficult for us to contemplate the economic sacrifices which might be involved for us in the Polish market in order to promote these political purposes if we were not faring so badly in other markets as a result of USA behaviour. We appreciated that the proposal to supply wheat had come from the Polish side and we were interested to hear that the State Department rather than the Department of Agriculture had the primary responsibility in this case. The source of the suggestion and the motives underlying USA consideration of it were not, however, relevant to the practical effects which acceptance of it could have on our wheat marketing position.

9. We enquired whether it might not be possible for the USA to supply more of other things which the Poles would otherwise have to import and thus leave them in a better position to continue financing wheat purchases more or less on a commercial basis. For example, might it not be feasible to provide more machinery of the kinds which the Poles were planning to import from Western countries with foreign currencies or to import from the USSR in return for readily marketable coal. Such an alternative would clearly be preferable from our point of view and, to the extent that it reduced Polish dependence on the Soviets for capital equipment and spare parts, might have some good secondary political effects. Both Leddy and Nichols said that wheat was what the Poles wanted and they were strongly insisting on it. Nichols added that he thought it was politically important for the West to provide their wheat. He observed that it would be difficult to justify withholding wheat from one Eastern Europe country after it had been supplied fairly readily and in substantial quantities to Yugoslavia.

10. We asked the State Department officials when this wheat might be delivered if the USA were to accept the Polish proposal. Nichols said that, when and if agreement is reached, the timing of shipments will be largely a matter for the Poles to determine in the light of their storage position and the availability of shipping tonnage. He did not think we could assume that shipments would necessarily be deferred beyond this fiscal year.

11. Nichols indicated that they would probably be resuming their talks with the Poles next week and would be grateful to have such comments as we might be able to make by then, even though final decisions might not be taken here until some weeks later. We shall be sending you our comments and suggestions in a further message tomorrow morning.

USA POLISH AID NEGOTIATIONS

Following the phone call this morning from Mitchell Sharp, we phoned Leddy in the State Department to give him orally the quick and sharp reaction which the Polish proposal regarding wheat had met in Ottawa. We said that the apparent inclination on the part of the USA to consider the provision of wheat on such terms had occasioned "the most acute distress". We pointed out that while the State Department might see some arguments for accommodating the Poles in this manner, they should be under no illusions about the seriousness of the political consequences for Canadian-USA relations. We remarked that in our negotiations with the Poles we had kept as closely as possible to commercial terms. If the USA were to consider supplying all or part of the quantity of wheat now suggested on somewhat similar terms to those which we had negotiated, that would be a different matter; but what apparently now was being contemplated was a deal based in effect on a long-term interest-free credit. Such an arrangement would almost certainly rule out future sales by Canada or other exporters on a commercial basis to Poland or for that matter to many other normal customers.

2. Leddy said there was not a hope of the Poles being able now to finance the quantity they need on the terms accepted for the smaller and earlier purchases from Canada. We again enquired whether that would necessarily be the case if the USA were to provide the Poles with some other things in their total import programme, thereby releasing foreign exchange for continued wheat purchases. We thought that the dangers in upsetting the wheat market were so serious (not only from our point of view but from the point of view of the world economy generally) that the alternative possibilities should be thoroughly examined especially since some of them would affect Soviet exports more than the exports of friendly countries. Leddy doubted that there was much scope in this direction.

3. We told Leddy that we might be making more formal representations to the USA Administration within the next few days. Meanwhile he could take our conversation as an accurate indication of our strong views.

4. Leddy reported that Merchant had already been in to see Dillon about the reaction which the USA Embassy had received this morning in Ottawa.

5. If you wish us to make more specific and formal representations we assume that you will give us instructions.

UNITED STATES; DISPOSAL OF AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JAN. 7)

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the United States was proposing to dispose of further quantities of its surplus agricultural products in a manner which would be deeply resented in western Canada. Large amounts of wheat would be shipped on credit to Poland to enable the Poles to become independent of Russia for their supplies, so it was said. Tied sales to Austria, Iceland and elsewhere were also contemplated. He was not sure if anything could be done, but he would at least try to prevent announcements about these transactions for the time being.

31. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on United States plans for disposing of surplus agricultural products, including wheat, to European countries in the near future.

USA-POLISH AID NEGOTIATIONS

Leddy phoned this morning to enquire further about our attitude towards the two hypothetical questions asked in paragraph 6 of our telegram 868. In the course of the conversation he asked whether the rather vigorous reaction which we had conveyed to him and which had reached him in equally strong terms through the USA Embassy in Ottawa represented the firm views of the Canadian Government as a whole. He wondered, for instance, whether this reaction reflected the thinking of those concerned with foreign policy matters in the Canadian Government who might be expected to attach considerable importance to the encouragement of further liberalization of the Polish economic and political system. We said that we thought the comments which the State Department had received could be taken as representing the Canadian Government's position. While there might be differences in shading, we doubted that there would be any significant divergence of view in this case between those concerned in External Affairs and those dealing with this matter in other departments. We were sure that all departments recognized the importance of encouraging the tendencies which had recently developed in Poland. Even those who were primarily concerned with this aspect, however, would no doubt question whether this should happen at the expense of Canada's economic position. If meeting the Polish request (by either the USA or Canada) required the adoption of practices which would further endanger the wheat marketing prospect and thereby lessen Canada's capacity to play its part in international affairs, it was unlikely that anybody in Ottawa would regard the proposal as an advantageous one even from the international political point of view. Moreover, if one of the main results of the transaction would be to place a further strain on USA-Canadian relations (which would almost inevitably happen if the USA itself were to meet the Polish request), we would not be surprised to find that the proposal was looked upon with disfavour from an External Affairs viewpoint. In short, we thought there were political considerations which might be regarded, from the Canadian point of view, as outweighing the political advantages attributed to the proposal and as reinforcing the commercial objections.

2. Leddy enquired whether much attention had been given in Ottawa to the suggestion that some or all of the additional wheat might be supplied by Canada. We replied that undoubtedly this possibility had been examined. We added that for us to offer wheat to Poland on terms anywhere near comparable with those mentioned in the USA negotiations would reduce the likelihood of further sales on a commercial basis even to Poland itself and might affect the terms on which other importing countries would be prepared to buy wheat from Canada. Leddy remarked that according to his understanding the Poles would still need to import wheat this year and subsequently to meet their current requirements, and would probably be at least as willing and able to finance such imports on commercial terms if this transaction were to go through as they would be if the proposal were to be rejected.

3. Leddy concluded by saying that this whole proposition was going to have to receive a good deal more study and that they would no doubt be discussing the possibilities with us again. Meanwhile they would welcome any comments which might help them through the dilemma which they are facing (a dilemma in which they feel the West generally, including Canada, is also involved).

PROVISION OF WHEAT TO POLAND

The Polish Ambassador here called on us yesterday morning at his request, and spoke to us very much along the lines of Michalowski's conversation with our delegation in New York.

2. The Ambassador said that he had heard "from various sources" of our concern about a request which they had made to the USA for 1,200,000 tons of wheat (he made no mention of the fact that their request had since been reduced reluctantly to about half that amount; neither did he intimate that he was approaching us at the suggestion of the USA negotiators). He wondered whether we realized that this quantity was being sought solely as a reserve and that it would not affect "in any way" their imports from various countries for current consumption. He pointed out that this amount was equivalent to only three months' supply for urban consumers. With a stockpile of this size, it was the hope of the Polish Government that, particularly in order to improve the state of Polish agriculture and raise production levels, compulsory deliveries could be dispensed with and a free market established for agricultural products generally within Poland. He confirmed that what they were seeking from the USA was a longterm credit involving payments temporarily in zloties. He repeated that with this minimum stockpile, Poland would still expect to continue importing from Canada and other wheat-producing countries for many years to come. Eventually, of course, it was hoped that the proposed reorganization of Polish agriculture would enable Poland to meet the bulk of its own wheat requirements. At that time, imports from Canada and other exporters would naturally decline and the Ambassador thought we could have no objection to such a development. The mere existence of a modest national reserve would not, however, in itself result in a reduction of current imports.

3. More or less as an aside the Ambassador enquired whether Canada might now or in the future consider selling wheat to Poland on medium rather than short term credits. There seemed to be in this remark a slight hint that if we were to contemplate credits running for seven or ten years some part of the reserve as well as a portion of imports for current consumption might be taken from Canada.

4. We undertook to transmit the Ambassador's explanation and observations to the authorities concerned in Ottawa. Although in the meantime we could not comment on some of the points which he had made, we confirmed to him that we were troubled about the indications which we had received of a proposal for supplying a very large amount of wheat to Poland on special non commercial terms. We stressed that our objections to this possible transaction had nothing to do with our attitude towards Poland (which the Ambassador knew to be friendly and helpful as evidenced by our own negotiations), but reflected our anxieties about what was happening to wheat markets generally as a result of USA surplus disposal activities. We remarked that we thought he might find our worries understandable if he were to consider how Poland would regard actions of another government which disturbed the markets for some major Polish export, for example, coal. We expressed some doubt that even if the quantity of wheat now under discussion were to go entirely into a well-insulated stockpile (which might not in practice be feasible), the transaction on the extraordinary terms proposed would have no effect on current imports. Although the same quantities might continue to be imported, the prices and terms on which Poland would expect to procure such imports would almost inevitably be influenced by the fact that such large quantities had been made available under a very favourable longterm credit.

5. In connection with the Ambassador's reference to the possibility of medium term credits from Canada, we did not know for sure how this would be regarded. We thought, however, that in the recent negotiations the Canadian authorities had gone about as far as they felt it was prudent to go. Generally we were unwilling to sell wheat or other consumables on lengthy credits. We also questioned whether it was wise from the point of view of the importing country to finance such commodities by building up a heavy indebtedness for future years.

6. We assured the Ambassador that we would inform him of any reactions which we might receive from Ottawa in connection with the various points which he had made.

FAREWELL CALL ON SECRETARY BENSON

I used the opportunity of my leavetaking call on Secretary Benson this morning to emphasize again our concern about the deterioration in the wheat marketing situation. Ritchie accompanied me on this call, and Butz, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, was present with Benson.

2. I referred to the other difficulties which had developed in USA-Canadian relations. I said that if, on top of everything else, there was to be a further deterioration, or a lack of improvement, in our relations on wheat, the repercussions would be very serious indeed. Without going into details, I reminded the Secretary that our concern related not only to the aggressiveness with which they were pressing their giveaway deals, but also to the reduction which they were apparently accepting in the price at which they were selling wheat commercially. I pointed out that a sharp fall in the wheat market could have direct and indirect economic effects in many parts of the world to the disadvantage not only of Canada and other friendly countries but also of the USA. I remarked that we in Canada felt that we had recently been the one stabilizing element in the wheat market but I was not sure how long we would feel we could afford to go on performing this function.

3. Secretary Benson was sympathetic as usual. He did not like the kinds of arrangements that they were having to resort to. If agricultural policy had been wiser right after the war, this situation might have been avoided. He hoped that the policies which he had introduced would remove the basic causes of the current difficulties before many years. It would take some time, however, especially as so much of the earlier legislation had escalator clauses. He could not, of course, always be certain of congressional support for his measures. Some senators and congressmen like PL480 and would be happy to make it a permanent fixture. He had, however, insisted that the extension of this legislation be for only one year, at which time Congress could review the position. Senator Hubert Humphrey was one of those who told the Secretary that he would have been happy to have gone much further.

4. Butz questioned whether our commercial exports to such a traditional market as the UK were being much affected. He maintained that the only noncommercial exports made to the UK were under barter deals and he observed that these deals were now being allowed to "taper off". He realized, however, that we were faced generally with a very difficult wheat marketing prospect and said he would not deny that some USA activities (especially barter arrangements) had adversely affected commercial exports of both Canada and the USA. He referred to the fact that the Secretary might be writing a letter to Mr. Howe about wheat marketing problems, and he wondered whether such a letter would be appreciated in present circumstances. I replied that if any such letter would have to be confined to expressions of sympathy, it would be better not to send it. If it could be more concrete, it might have value.

5. Butz then tried to divert the conversation to the difficulties being encountered in the negotiations with Poland but I discouraged this as I thought it unwise to get further involved in this matter until we receive more guidance from you. Butz indicated that he had just been talking to Kalijarvi, the Assistant Secretary of State, and that there was a move on foot to have himself and Dillon, the Deputy Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, go to Ottawa for talks on what might be done about the Polish problem. Butz said to us afterwards that he would probably not be able to go as he would be absent from Washington, but Marvin McClain, another Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, might go if the visit takes place.

6. I would not say that the call on Secretary Benson was particularly productive, but I think it was useful to let him know again how we feel about this subject.

USA-POLAND AID NEGOTIATIONS — WHEAT

This will confirm the information given you by telephone concerning the results of the talks held at the U.S. Ambassador's house last Saturday evening (April 20). As you know Mr. Douglas Dillon along with Messrs John Leddy and Gordon Fraser had come up from Washington for these talks which were led on our side by Mr. C.D. Howe.

2. Mr. Howe indicated to Mr. Dillon that we would be prepared to discuss with the Poles the sort of assurance and its terms which we would expect from them and which might make acceptable to us the so-called stockpile of 500,000 tons of U.S. wheat. The Polish negotiators may therefore be in touch with you after they have been informed of this Canadian position by the Americans. You might let us know immediately they contact you so that a time can be arranged for our talks with the Poles, in Ottawa.

3. The U.S.A. side was rather insistent that Canada should take up part of the Polish stockpile needs. The total quantity under discussion between the Poles and the U.S. at the moment is 500,000 tons with the possibility being left open for the Poles to ask for an addition of up to 300,000 tons if this should prove necessary. On this question Mr. Howe explained that the Canadian Government had no means at the present time (and before the new Parliament meets) to undertake the supply of any part of the 500,000 tons or the additional 300,000 tons. He stated however that we would be prepared at the appropriate time to consider the possibility of supplying the latter amount or part of it if the Poles made a case for it. Consequently we would be prepared in our forthcoming discussions with the Poles to explore with them in a very preliminary way the possibility of supplying Canadian wheat to the stockpile.

4. As we have already informed you, Mr. Howe took the occasion offered by Mr. Dillon's visit to explain to him and his colleagues in quite strong terms the damage which the U.S. surplus disposal activities had caused and were causing to Canadian export interests.

5. You may wish to make an appropriate occasion to tell Mr. Dillon that Mr. Howe and Canadian officials concerned very much appreciated his coming to Ottawa. We were all quite favourably impressed by his competence and sincerity.

U.S.-POLISH NEGOTIATIONS

Following approach by Polish Ambassador in Washington and expected imminent completion of U.S.-Polish negotiations, officials from Ottawa went to Washington May 2 for separate discussions with Polish delegation and with State Department. The Americans had informed the Poles of the importance they attached to Canada receiving satisfactory assurances regarding the continuation of normal commercial markets.

2. We told the Poles that in view of U.S.-Polish negotiations for one-half million tons of wheat on disposal terms Canada desired assurance that Poland would import a minimum of 300,000 tons during each crop year 1957-58 and 1958-59 which Canada would consider making available on same terms as recent purchase which averages two and one-half years credit (the existing agreement for 150,000 tons in 1957-58 would form part of the 300,000 tons minimum). (We do not contemplate offering additional quantities on more favourable terms — this decision refers to the point made in paragraph 3 of our E-645 of April 25).†

3. The Polish delegation were obviously well briefed and gave verbal assurances similar to those in your message namely that in the view of the Polish Government the acquisition of the stockpile from the U.S. "would not affect in any way" future imports for current consumption and that Canada would continue to rate as a "first class" source of such imports.

4. The discussion was stalemated since we considered it impossible to draw a practical distinction between imports for current consumption and for stockpile and since the Poles were not prepared to offer any more concrete assurances about our future commercial sales. It was however made clear that Canada is in no way critical of Polish efforts to get the best deal possible from U.S. but rather than Canadian criticism is directed towards U.S. surplus disposal methods which continue to undermine export marketings of Canada and other exporters. We stressed that Canada is sympathetic to the Polish objectives and believes that the terms upon which business had been concluded between us (and further sales we were proposing) was evidence of Canadian desire to meet Polish needs.

5. Incidentally the Polish delegation raised the matter of the art treasures and we assured them that we would continue to assist in finding a solution to this complex and difficult matter quite independently of their wheat purchases here.

6. Undoubtedly the Polish delegation have transmitted Canadian views to their government. The above should serve as background in the event that you are again approached.

7. For your own info the U.S. State Department are fully informed on the outcome of our discussions with the Poles. Our telegram E-718 to Washington refers.†

USA-POLISH AID NEGOTIATIONS: WHEAT

We have now spoken with Kalijarvi along the lines of your message. We indicated to him that he should regard our conversation as formally confirming that our earlier misgivings about the Polish transaction continued unabated.

2. We think you can take it for certain that the State Department now understands what our attitude is, even though they may not welcome it. We cannot, of course, say what effect if any this will have on their negotiations with the Poles. Presumably they will at least let the Polish negotiators know that we are by no means satisfied. If this happens, the willingness of the Poles to consider something additional for Canada may depend in some measure on their understanding of what exactly we want as a minimum. Even though several possibilities were mentioned during the meeting with the Poles here on May 2, it may well be that there is some confusion in Warsaw about what might now be needed to satisfy us. This seems highly probable since their "declaration" was apparently given to our chargé after the date of the meeting in Washington. They may therefore have some honest doubts about how much further they might have to go to meet our present desires or conditions. In any event, if no further comment is made directly to them concerning their declaration, they may be able to say later that they had assumed from our silence that we were contented (even though they might have had an intimation of our continuing attitude from the USA negotiators). You may wish to consider, therefore, whether in the circumstances it is sufficient to leave our chargé with the rather passive instructions contained in your telegram E-719 May 9 or whether it would be preferable to have him call on the Polish official from whom he had received the "declaration" and remind that official of the proposal made to their negotiators here along the lines of paragraph 2 in that message.

3. Since the above was dictated, Kalijarvi has phoned to enquire whether it would be helpful if they were to substitute rye for part of the proposed quantity of wheat. He did not know to what extent this might be practicable from the USA point of view or acceptable to the Poles. He nevertheless thought the possibility worth exploring. We replied that we could not comment authoritatively but our impression was that rye might avoid at least some of the problems associated with wheat. If you have strong views one way or another on this possibility, you might let us know in order that we might inform Kalijarvi.

UNITED STATES-POLISH AID NEGOTIATIONS: WHEAT

It has become fairly clear that the United States arrangement for the provision on very long-term credit of 500,000 tons of wheat to Poland will go forward and that the Poles are unwilling to give us any specific assurances about future purchases. They have, however, given us an oral assurance that their normal requirements from us will be unaffected by this agreement.

2. We and the Department of Trade and Commerce, with Mr. Howe's concurrence, have come to the conclusion that further pressure on Poland for more specific assurances would be likely to prejudice not only our political, but also our long-run commercial relations with Poland. We have, therefore, sent to Warsaw the attached telegram† to ensure that there is no misunderstanding about what was the true nature of our concern, about the fact that our criticism was directed to United States policies, not Polish, and about the exact kind of assurances we had hoped for. We emphasized the fact that we sympathized with the Poles' economic difficulties and the problems they face.[101]

CANADIAN MAGAZINES — POSSIBLE PROTECTION

I attach four copies of a memorandum on this subject for consideration in relation to the coming budget. You might want to show copies, not only to the Prime Minister, but also to Mr. Pickersgill, who has given a good deal of thought to this subject in the past, and to Mr. Pearson who will be interested in possible international repercussions.

As you know, while we started by considering this as a subject for tariff action we have swung towards possible action in the form of an excise tax. I have collaborated with Dr. Eaton in working out the proposals put forward here.

We await your further instructions.

CANADIAN MAGAZINES — POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE[102]

For some years now the Canadian Periodical Press Association has been asking for help from the Government in the face of increasingly intense competition from the United States. Some assistance has been given; for instance, various Government departments have bought more advertising space in Canadian magazines. However, the position of these magazines has continued to deteriorate. It has now become seriously questionable whether Canadian magazines — both the so-called "consumer magazines" such as MacLeans, Saturday Night, Chatelaine, and Liberty, and even the so-called "business papers" which circulate amongst various trading and manufacturing groups in Canada — can continue to survive.

The fact that the publication of magazines, particularly consumer magazines, is no longer profitable in Canada, even under conditions of general economic expansion and prosperity, is attested by at least two types of evidence. On the one hand, certain confidential figures have been received indicating the financial position of some of the better known Canadian magazines. On the other hand, post-war experience speaks pretty clearly: New World ceased publication in 1947; National Home Monthly in 1950; Liberty reduced from weekly to monthly in 1947; Saturday Night reduced from weekly to semi-monthly in 1955; and there have been casualties amongst some small French-language publications as well.

Meanwhile American magazines have extended their coverage of the Canadian market. The total circulation of Canadian "consumer magazines" has kept fairly constant since the war; but the circulation of U.S. "consumer magazines" in Canada has almost doubled. In 1948 approximately two-thirds of the "consumer magazines" sold in Canada were American and one-third were Canadian; by 1954-55 the American share was four-fifths.

The competition from U.S. magazines takes two forms, one old and the other new, and Canadian magazines have been asking for some sort of protection against both of them. The old form comprises the "overflow circulation" of American magazines into Canada: Saturday Evening Post, Life, Ladies' Home Journal, Newsweek, and so forth, not to mention many of the more lurid exhibits on our news-stands. The new form, which did not exist before the war, comprises the special editions of U.S. publications designed for the Canadian market; the best known are the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest; in addition there are four women's magazines, circulated through chain stores, each of which puts out an edition carrying some Canadian reading matter and some Canadian advertising: Better Living and Everywoman's which began this practice in 1951, Family Circle in 1952, and Parents Magazine in 1954; and finally there are two business papers in this class, Canadian Farm Chemicals and Cleaning and Laundry World.

Overflow Circulation

Against overflow circulation the only form of protection that might reasonably be considered would be the imposition of a tariff. If this were to be done the most appropriate and defensible approach would be to resort to the rates already applicable against imports of advertising material, as follows:

		B.P.	M.F.N.
Item 178:	Advertising matter, etc.:
	.....per pound	5 cts.	10 cts
	but not less than	-	25 p.c.

These rates might be applied, in some rough approximation, to the advertising content of imported magazines. It could be claimed that the Government was not thereby going back on its traditional opposition in principle to any restriction on "the free movement of ideas"; but that the free influx of American advertising, carried in magazines, was having (as indeed it is) serious effects on the position of Canadian manufacturers in trying to stand up to competition of American products widely advertised in U.S. magazines.

However, for several reasons it is not recommended that this approach be adopted, at any rate at this stage. Whatever explanation is advanced, the fact would remain that a tariff on imports of magazines, not unlike that imposed in 1931 and removed as a matter of principle in 1935, was being reimposed in 1956. The re-establishment of free entry for magazines in 1935 was part, and an important part, of the Canada-U.S. Trade Agreement and has subsequently been bound under GATT. It will be noted that the tariff rates applicable to advertising, which are quoted above, include a substantial British preference; if these rates were to be applied to imported magazines, the blow to the U.S., which is very sensitive about preferences, would be all the harder to take and the "no-new-preference rule" in GATT would probably be breached. Difficult questions might arise as to how to deal with magazines published abroad in French. And, finally, the administration of such a tariff would probably be pretty difficult.

Special Editions

Serious and immediate consideration may be given, however, to the special editions of U.S. publications. The Canadian publishers have left the impression that they are more worried by this new, double-edged competition than by overflow circulation; these editions not merely displace Canadian magazines in the field of circulation, but also undermine their income by selling space to Canadian advertisers. This advertising space is frequently offered at rates substantially below those that the Canadian papers can offer. Complete figures for all the special editions mentioned above are not available, but the inroads on advertising revenues made by Time and Reader's Digest and disclosed by the accompanying table are sufficiently striking.

(1) Magazines included in "All Magazines" are Canadian Home Journal, Canadian Homes & Gardens, Chatelaine, Maclean's, Mayfair, La Revue Moderne, La Revue Populaire, Le Samedi, Liberty, Reader's Digest (Special Canadian editions in French and English), Saturday Night, and Time (Special Canadian edition).

(2) Special Canadian edition.

(3) Special Canadian editions in French and English.

It will be seen from the table that these two special editions (or three, if French and English editions of Reader's Digest are considered to be separate) now absorb well over one-third of the total advertising revenues obtained by this important group of magazines.

The publishers of special Canadian editions of U.S. magazines have peculiar advantages in the Canadian market — advantages not shared by Canadian magazines. Their circulation and advertising campaigns can be managed as part of the very large and expensive campaigns put on in their own country. They can in some cases print most of the Canadian edition as part of their home edition. Most important, while the Canadian magazines have to pay normal prices for their reading matter, illustrations, etc., the special editions can and do get the great bulk of their material as a by-product from their parent publications.

The most appropriate way of restraining this form of competition appears to be the imposition of a tax. Such a tax would have the following features:

(1) It would be levied on any publisher of a special Canadian edition, whether located in Canada (like Reader's Digest) or abroad (like the others mentioned above); hence it would be non-discriminatory in form and, in the judgment of Canadian officials, could be effectively defended in relation to GATT and other treaty obligations.

(ii) It probably should apply not only to Canadian editions in English, but also to French language translations (e.g. Reader's Digest) thus giving some relief to Canadians publishing magazines in that language.

(iii) It should be levied on gross advertising revenue, thus bearing directly on the point at which Canadian publishers feel the competition most keenly. If levied in that form (as opposed to so-many-cents-per-copy) there would be no direct incentive to raise prices to the consumer.

(iv) From the point of view of administration it would probably be practicable to follow sales tax procedure and require a publisher to pay tax before the end of one month on the value of advertising contained in magazines (of the type defined) sold in Canada in the previous month.

(v) As for the rate of tax, it should presumably be aimed at offsetting the peculiar advantages which the special editions have over the genuine Canadian magazines; it must be admitted, however, that computations of this sort are open to wide differences, and in the last analysis the rate of tax would be pretty arbitrary.

Of course, if this whole matter were judged on purely commercial or economic grounds, there would be no justification for a special tax. Other industries should not be encouraged to expect similar action if they get into difficulties owing to U.S. competition. The only justification would lie in the view that Canadian magazines of all sorts — consumer magazines and business papers alike — form a really important strand in the fabric of Canadian life, and that no government could allow a strand of this importance to be broken or worn away.

THE BUDGET, 1956-57

1. The Minister of Finance reported on the budgetary measures he proposed to place before the House of Commons the next day, March 20th. Last year he had budgeted for a deficit of $160 million. This deficit was now expected to be only $52 million. Revenues for 1955-56 were 4 per cent greater than forecast and expenditures were up 2 per cent. The main items of increased expenditure were $20 million for wheat storage costs, $5 million for support of agricultural prices and $15 million for debt charges — a reflection of higher interest rates.

At current rates of taxation, there would be an expected surplus of $125 million in 1956-57. He was going to propose no tax reductions except certain exemptions from the sales tax for a number of building products. The total reduction would be $12 million, leaving a surplus of $113 million.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Home Oil Case, which allowed an oil producer in tax years 1949 and 1950 to have the depletion allowance calculated on an individual well basis rather than on overall operations, required a change in the law and an amendment would be proposed, to date from 1951, when the regulations had been changed. If this were not done it was possible that the Crown would be liable for several millions of dollars in claims, and revenues in the future might be jeopardized.

In response to many recent comments on foreign ownership and control of Canadian companies, he was going to state that negotiations were underway to amend the tax treaty with the United States on the percentage ownership required for the lower rate of withholding tax on dividends.[103]

No tariff changes were proposed except some downward adjustments on agricultural machinery and equipment. These were consequent upon a tariff board ruling which had narrowed the scope of a number of items entering free of duty.

The only other proposal of interest, but one which would undoubtedly give rise to a great deal of comment, was the levying of a special excise tax of 20 per cent on the advertising revenue of special Canadian editions of foreign magazines like Time and Readers Digest. Canadian magazines could not compete with such editions and, unless something was done, most of them would gradually disappear. Even this 20 per cent tax would be only a holding operation and more help would probably have to be provided in a few years time. The magazine publishers affected by the tax would either stop their Canadian editions, absorb the tax or raise their prices. They would probably complain vociferously as would the advertising agencies. What the public reaction would be he was not sure.

2. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Non-Canadian editions of foreign magazines would continue to enter Canada. Even this protective measure would not seriously alter the present situation in which four-fifths of the magazines read were not Canadian. The effect of this was that foreign brand names, mainly of U.S. origin, were constantly being put before the public. Anything which could be done to keep Canadian names to the front was desirable.

(b) It was also important, from the point of view of Canadian culture and the development of a national public opinion, to preserve Canadian magazines. Protection, even of the most blatant kind, could be justified on these grounds.

(c) It was suggested that the tax should apply only to new advertising contracts. It was pointed out, on the other hand, that this principle had never been recognized in past budgets. If a change were made of this kind, car dealers, for example, could point to a useful precedent to claim rebates at such time as taxes on cars were reduced.

(d) It was unfortunate that books from the U.S. were still subject to a tax whereas magazines entered duty-free. Anything that could be done to correct this situation would be desirable.

(e) The adverse trade balance was getting worse, but there did not appear to be anything that could, or needed to be done at this time to correct the situation. It was to be hoped that some purchases would be transferred from the U.S. to the U.K.

(f) With the revocation of the gold export regulations, it might be useful to mint some gold coins as one way of giving encouragement to the mines. It was argued, on the other hand, that this would be more bother than it was worth. The amount of gold involved was so small that it would have little impact on the gold problem.

3. The Cabinet approved the budget proposals of the Minister of Finance for 1956-57.[104]

TAX ON SPECIAL EDITIONS OF U.S. MAGAZINES

It may be helpful if I keep you informed of developments in the field of the press and public relations relating to the new tax on special editions.

During the general briefing of the Press Gallery immediately before your Budget Speech there were a large number of questions on this subject. Most of them were pretty objective; only one or two showed a definite bias (e.g. Grant Dexter asked whether this was just another form of protectionism).

That evening, after leaving your reception, I dropped in on Tyler Thompson, the Minister of the U.S. Embassy, who lives near me, and spent an hour running over the ground with him. He fully sympathized with the Government's effort to do something to save the situation for Canadian magazines. He very much hoped that as far as possible all the emphasis of our speeches and publicity would be on the positive aspect of saving Canadian magazines; he feared the international implications if Canadians, and particularly Canadians in authority, suggested that the action had been taken because of an invasion by undesirable American products.

I did not hear CBC that night but understand that on their 10 o'clock news they summarized the proposal fairly and effectively. Their reference at 8 a.m. the following morning was also, I think, satisfactory.

As for the Canadian morning papers, the only two I have seen so far were the Gazette and the Globe and Mail. The news story in yesterday morning's Gazette was, I thought, fair enough but the news story in the Globe was so slanted that the reader might well form the impression that Time and Reader's Digest were no longer going to be available to the Canadian public.

I telephoned to Toronto and asked Mr. Perry to see if he could try to ensure that no editorials, either in the Globe and Mail or other papers, were based on this erroneous assumption. He said he had already been talking to the Telegram and would take the matter up with the Globe and Mail. I see that in this morning's Globe and Mail while they take a real swipe at your Budget Speech they do not mention the tax on magazines at all.

This morning's Gazette had, as you will have seen, a leading editorial on the subject. It is at pains to criticise the particular form of the tax, i.e. the fact that it is based on advertising, but avoids discussion of the basic issue. Maybe the Opposition will pick up this line and adopt it.

One of my spies in the Press Gallery tells me that the Leader of the CCF [M.J. Coldwell] personally favoured the action that had been taken but this was not necessarily the party line.

The most serious newspaper development was, strangely enough, in that usually reputable organ, the New York Times. I attach a copy of the article which ran in yesterday morning's late city edition. It did not run in the earlier edition, which is the one which normally goes on sale in Canada. I have told Daniell over the telephone that I have found his article very disturbing and have asked him to come in and talk to me about it. He says he will be glad to do so and that he is planning another "and a more thoughtful" article for the Sunday edition. I have no doubt I can get him to publish something better in that edition but of course one can never erase a smear that has already been published.

Probably the best support so far has come from Michael Barkway speaking on News Roundup over the CBC last night.

TAX ON SPECIAL EDITIONS OF NON-CANADIAN MAGAZINES

This morning I telephoned to Mr. Heeney our Ambassador in Washington. I had been told that the statement was made on the radio this morning that this special tax had been amongst the questions discussed between the Prime Minister and the President during the past few days[105] and I wanted to find out whether this was true and if so what had happened. I reached Heeney only a couple of hours after he got back from Washington and Mr. Pearson was in his office while I was speaking to him.

Heeney reported that the President had raised this subject with Mr. St. Laurent. It appeared that Time-Life-Fortune had already been putting great pressure on the State Department and had also reached the White House.

The Prime Minister gave an explanation along the lines that had been agreed in Cabinet beforehand. (Mr. Heeney did not say exactly what was said.) The President replied that he had not formerly heard this side of the question. Mr. Heeney said that the President did not commit himself to accept, but did not argue against, the explanation.

On a couple of other occasions Mr. Dulles had raised the question with Mr. Pearson who had given an explanation along the same lines.

When meeting representatives of Canadian Papers in Washington both the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson gave them a list of subjects that had been discussed at the meeting with the President and included this special tax on the list but there was no discussion or elaboration of any of these items during the Press Conference.

Mr. Dulles also referred to the item in his Press Conference but did not discuss it nor did he indicate who had raised the matter for discussion.

US REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING THE SPECIAL 20 PERCENT EXCISE TAX ON ADVERTISING REVENUES OF SPECIAL CANADIAN EDITIONS OF FOREIGN MAGAZINES

At noon on March 29 we were invited to go at 5 pm that day to the office of Herbert Prochnow, Deputy Under-Secretary for Economic Affairs at the State Department, who we were told wanted to speak to me about this tax. On receiving the invitation we expressed some surprise on the grounds that the question had already been discussed only a few days before by the Prime Minister and the President and by yourself and the Secretary of State. My calendar was quite full and we suggested to the State Department that it might be satisfactory to them if I called on Prochnow on Saturday, March 31, or preferably after the Easter weekend. The State Department called back to say that they would prefer to see someone from the Embassy at five o'clock as they had originally proposed. I agreed, and accordingly Couillard waited on Prochnow at that time. Prochnow was accompanied by three officers of his bureau, two from the Office of International Trade and Resources and one from the Canadian Desk.

2. Prochnow, talking from a lengthy brief, launched upon what proved to be an unyielding line of comment which occupied about 25 minutes, delayed but not broken by the several retorts which Couillard felt compelled to interpose in the course of it. He was to reveal also, as you will see, an unfortunate heavy-handedness which made the fifty minute interview rather an exasperating one. We feel, however, that much of Prochnow's ineptitude can be explained by his lack of knowledge of Canadian-US trade relations and his inexperience in international negotiation. Added to this is the fact that he appeared to feel duty bound to deliver his piece and not to admit the relevance of broader considerations outside the field of commercial policy.

3. Prochnow opened by referring to the "casual conversation" which had taken place on the new tax at White Sulphur Springs. He apologized for his last minute invitation, and explained that the State Department had been anxious to let us have their views in greater detail with the least delay. He said that they had at first thought of expressing their concern in a formal note but that, after further consideration, they had come to the conclusion that such an approach would be at variance with the friendly and informal manner in which our two countries conducted their relations. He expanded at quite some length on the unique and amicable nature of these relations; and referred to the "big deals" involving Canada in which he had participated as a banker in Chicago.

4. Coming finally to his main purpose, Prochnow said that the tax would hit particularly important and sensitive elements among US publishers. In spite of his attempt to use guarded language, it was quite apparent that pressures put on the White House by these interests had been strong, immediate and direct. This, no doubt explained the nature of some of the comments which were to follow. In any case, the spirit of Henry Luce unmistakably permeated the six or seven page memorandum which Prochnow was to recite. (We understand that the White House had instructed the State Department, before the White Sulphur Springs meeting, to express to Canadian representatives the serious concern of the US Government).

5. Prochnow said that they had been "surprised" at the Canadian Government's decision to impose the tax — the most unexpected source "for such a high tax" — in view of the example which Canada had always set in the field of commercial policy. He went on to make the point that no consultations had taken place before the tax was "announced so suddenly". When we spoke of the secrecy which traditionally attaches to the budget speech, he suggested that, nevertheless, the tax might have been the subject of consultations without any indication necessarily being given that it might be connected with the budget speech. Prochnow remained glued to his lengthy brief when we explained that the tax was an excise tax, therefore an internal, domestic tax which did not affect the free entry of foreign periodicals; it would be levied on any publisher of a special "Canadian" edition, whether located in Canada or abroad.

6. Prochnow went into some detail on every principle of commercial policy which in the US view the tax would offend. He said he recognized that no doubt the Canadian Government, like other governments, was subject to pressures by domestic groups seeking to protect their own business interests. He spoke at some length of the pressures which were constantly exerted on the US Government. He singled out the "beer case" with which he said he had personally been associated.[106] He referred to the hearing which had been given the offices of the Canadian Exporters Association. He explained that the administration had exposed itself to criticism, which had not failed to materialize, in the case of the Maryland Bill which, had it not been vetoed, would have prevented the establishment of a Canadian brewery there. He said that this had not been easy, particularly when the US brewers were not permitted to establish a market for their products in Canada. He said that the US Government had resisted in the Maryland case and would continue to resist all protectionist pressures because of the "principles" involved. He was surprised and sorry he said, that the Canadian Government had failed similarly to resist the protectionist pressure which he implied was behind the government's decision to impose the special tax. He insisted that the new tax was clearly discriminatory against the US, in that it was aimed directly at the interests of US publishers who should not be "penalized" for their success in the Canadian market.

7. Needless to say, we felt compelled to break into his statement again to counter his comments and their implications. Prochnow was obviously determined, however, to conclude his delivery of the views contained in the memorandum before him. His unfamiliarity with the background of Canadian-US trade relations was such that we had the impression that our comments and counter-arguments had little if any effect.

8. The recital went on and Prochnow claimed that statistical information which had been made available to the State Department showed that the position of Canadian magazines had not deteriorated but that on the contrary it had improved. He brushed aside the list of casualties in Canadian periodicals, saying that it was inherent in the publishing business that the casualty and birth rates should be fairly high.

9. Another "serious worry" which Prochnow expressed was lest the "Canadian example" be followed by certain Latin American countries, where the US continued to make strenuous efforts to prevent a number of governments from imposing restrictive measures against [106] Voir/See Documents 219-223.

US magazines — he instanced the Reader's Digest. He departed long enough from commercial policy considerations to state that the State Department felt it important that there should be as full as possible a dissemination of US views and policies in those countries. (We were waiting for him to include Canada in "those countries", but he did not).

10. The tenor of Prochnow's comments had become obvious to us early on, and we did not refrain from interrupting his recital whenever we could not agree. When Prochnow had concluded his set piece, we reminded him that the Canadian Government had already been informed at the very highest level of the US Government's views about the tax: furthermore we observed that President Eisenhower, in conversation with the PM, had recognized that there were "two sides to the question". Most if not all of the commercial policy arguments he had used against the tax were fully familiar to us; indeed taken directly from the Canadian book. Prochnow seemed to be quite oblivious of the fact that the arguments and considerations he was rather smugly invoking were those which on so many occasions were invoked against the US itself. The commercial policy officers he had with him, such as Isaiah Frank, did not of course go onto this shaky ground, which their new boss was treading so confidently. They limited their interventions to an attempt to establish that the Canadian magazines did not need the "protection" to be accorded them. They pointed to the danger of invoking the percentage-of-domestic-market argument ("four-fifth") and they stressed the increased difficulties which the US publishers would probably have to face in Latin American markets.

11. We emphasized the motive behind the Canadian Government's decision which we said was much more fundamental than the commercial consideration on which Prochnow based his complaint: what was involved to put it briefly was the survival of a reasonable minimum of Canadian periodicals. (We must have told Prochnow this at least a dozen times). What was involved was not the protection of an industry but rather the maintenance of an institution — our national periodical literature. We stressed the role and importance of Canadian magazines as an "important strand in the fabric of Canadian life." The decision announced by the Canadian Government was that "It could not allow this strand to be broken or worn away." The Canadian record in the field of commercial policy was such, in spite of serious failings in the policies and actions of other countries, that it should be self-evident that the action taken to attempt to preserve a Canadian institution was not the sort of action which would be contemplated with respect to a purely commercial product. When the meeting came to an end, Prochnow, despite our efforts, was still insisting on the commercial policy aspects and implications of the tax.

12. At Prochnow's request we agreed to pass on to you the "views and concern" which he had expressed. We made one exception with which we deal in the following paragraph.

13. Prochnow at the end of his original presentation had said that the State Department had given serious thought to the sort of reason which the Canadian Government might give, should it decide to reverse itself and not impose the tax. He said that it seemed to them that a satisfactory explanation would be that the Canadian Government had taken another look at the "international implications" involved. He said he realized that the Canadian Government would, however, have to forego the budgetary revenue which the tax would have afforded. In response to this sally we told Prochnow that we could not imagine that he would wish us to report this suggestion to Ottawa. We had the impression, however, our retort went over his head.

14. Prochnow did not specifically ask for an answer to his "expression of concern" on the part of the US Government. Nor did we say that one would be forthcoming. We had said, at the beginning of our answer to his recital, that as far as we knew the PM and yourself had stated to the President and the Secretary the reasons for the tax; what we had said about the tax on this occasion represented the views of the Canadian Government. We added that any possibility there was that the government might modify their decision (and we knew of none) would not likely be increased by further pressures from the US. Prochnow said he recognized this last point and that "they" had not made any public statement about the matter.

15. The ineptitude and heavy-handedness of Prochnow makes it difficult to judge the degree to which the US Government's complaint is based on infringements of commercial policy principles, including non-discrimination, and to what extent motivated by their sensitiveness to the powerful US interests affected. Certainly the latter element must account for the promptness and strength of their reaction. Had it not been for Prochnow's lack of experience in such matters it would have been difficult for us to show the degree of restraint which we hope we managed to retain. In any event, it would obviously have been futile to engage in an acrimonious argument (and a battle of statistics — we are of course deficient in this matter) which many of Prochnow's comments would have amply justified. We could not, however, and we did not let his worst comments go unchallenged. Still, Prochnow was probably quite sincere when he said that he was speaking in all friendliness. But he remained quite impervious to the points which we made in reply. In particular, he was obviously quite determined not to see, or could not see, the broader considerations, national in scope, which we emphasized at every opportunity and which prefaced most of our retorts.

16. As for the substance of the representations, I should think that on balance and in spite of the ineptitude which unfortunately characterized part of their delivery it would be advisable for us to make some answer. The [issue is obviously] considered "serious" by the administration and in the eyes of US officials it represents straight "protection" in terms of commercial policy.

17. We would like to have your full instructions soon as it is not at all inconceivable that we may be approached again before very long.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], April 10, 1956

PROPOSED TAX ON ADVERTISING IN SPECIAL CANADIAN EDITIONS OF FOREIGN MAGAZINES

Just before the interview on Friday with the representatives of the Reader's Digest, you mentioned that you had been somewhat surprised to hear that these special editions were apparently not offering advertising space at cut rates and were therefore not open to the charge of "dumping" advertising in unfair competition with Canadian periodicals. The Reader's Digest's spokesmen made this point themselves in the interview and in the memorandum† which they left behind. In the latter they point out that each line of advertising costs $16.07 in the Reader's Digest, compared with $4.34 in Maclean's, $3.71 in the Canadian Home Journal, $1.30 in Saturday Night, etc.

2. It is probably true that on the basis of lines or space the charges made for advertising in Reader's Digest, Time and the other special editions are at least as high as those of Canadian magazines. It was not, however, a part of the argument for the new tax that the special editions were indulging in "dumping" in this sense. What has been alleged is that these special editions, because of their ability to offer an exceptionally attractive periodical (the main costs of which have been spread over the massive circulation of the U.S. edition and the various international editions), are able to provide so much more advertising value per line that their rates are, in effect, much better bargains than those of the smaller Canadian publications. The truth of this allegation is brought out quite clearly on page 43 of the attached Canadian Marketing and Advertising Fact Book issued by the Reader's Digest Association of Canada. The table presented there attempts to show what the advertiser gets for his money in terms of the audience reached. In this context the "audience" means the number of people who actually read the magazine in question and therefore is considerably larger than the mere circulation. Apparently the authors have ascertained that two people read each copy of Maclean's, for instance, whereas at least three people read the Reader's Digest because of the broader appeal of its more attractive (and more expensive) editorial content. On this basis the table shows that similar effects are secured, in the case of black and white pages, by $1.04 spent on advertising in the Reader's Digest and $1.17 on advertising in the special edition of Time as would have been achieved by spending $1.66 on Maclean's, $1.70 on Weekend, $1.79 on Canadian Homes and Gardens, $1.93 on Liberty, $2.50 on Chatelaine, $2.69 on the Canadian Home Journal and $3.33 on La Revue Moderne, etc. Even more striking contrasts are found for advertising on two-colour and four-colour pages.

3. It would seem from this evidence presented by Reader's Digest itself that the uncompetitiveness of Canadian publications in respect of advertising is fairly well established; at least that is what the Reader's Digest was attempting to tell potential advertisers when this "Fact Book" was compiled in 1955.

4. Apart from the inability of Canadian publishers to provide at similar costs anything like as attractive as advertising medium as the special editions can supply, it might also be mentioned that national publishers do not have the kinds of resources which the special editions can command to attract potential advertisers by issuing costly "fact books" of this character, providing lavish entertainment and doing the other expensive things which are apparently the stock-in-trade of the publishers of the special editions.

5. Incidentally, it was suggested during the interview in your office that many publishers would no doubt go on placing their advertisements in the special editions even after the new tax comes into force. The implication was that the tax would be ineffective in diverting advertising to the support of truly Canadian periodicals. If that is the case it is a little hard to see why the special editions have not themselves raised their advertising rates by the 20% envisaged in this tax measure. Presumably they have calculated that what they had to offer was not that much more attractive than what the Canadian publications could provide. Since the special editions had not thought it safe to raise their rates previously by such a percentage it would seem a reasonable presumption that they will lose a good deal of business (presumably to Canadian magazines) when the new tax is applied.

6. Since the attached "Fact Book" has been loaned to the Department of Finance only until tonight it would be appreciated if you could glance at the table referred to and let us have it back this evening for return to Finance.

SPECIAL 20 PERCENT EXCISE TAX ON ADVERTISING REVENUES OF SPECIAL CANADIAN EDITIONS OF FOREIGN MAGAZINES

We received through the mail this morning from the Acting Secretary of State, and initialled by him, a note on this subject dated July 7.

2. We had not previously heard that a note would be delivered. Indeed we had gathered the rather firm impression from State Department officials concerned, who continue to take every opportunity to refer to the proposed tax, that the administration was not considering making written representations in addition to the views and comments which it had already made known.

3. When speaking to Parsons on another matter this morning, he threw some light on the timing of the note, namely that they had heard, presumably through their Embassy in Ottawa, that the Canadian Cabinet was scheduled to consider the question of the tax this week.

4. Following is the text of the note:

"The Acting Secretary of State presents his compliments to the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Canada and desires to refer to the concern of the USA Government over the proposal which is under consideration by the Canadian Government to impose a twenty percent tax on the advertising revenues of special Canadian editions of non-Canadian magazines which are circulated in Canada.

The interest which the USA Government attaches to this matter has already been brought to the attention of the Canadian Government in conversations between officials on a number of occasions, the most noteworthy of which was the meeting between President Eisenhower and Prime Minister St. Laurent at White Sulphur Springs last March.

The USA Government recognizes the objectives of the Canadian Government with respect to the Canadian magazine publishing industry. It has carefully noted the remarks of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on this subject. However, the USA Government continues to believe that the measure would have a discriminatory effect in practice and be injurious to established USA business interests.

Irrespective of the purpose of this measure, and however it may be described, its implementation would be a significant reversal of the trend toward development of commercial relations which both Canada and the USA have so persistently been trying to encourage. The Canadian Government will certainly agree that whenever one country adopts a measure of this kind, especially one that is highly publicized, it is apt to produce, or strengthen, a similar sentiment in the country. The USA Government believes that the strengthening of such sentiment is to the advantage of neither Canada nor the USA. Such pressures have successfully been resisted in the past by the two governments in the broader interests of both countries.

The USA is also convinced that this tax, if adopted, would set an undesirable precedent for other countries which could create difficulties for USA periodicals and possibly require them to cease publication in certain areas where their contribution to the cause of the free world is in the interests of Canada as well as the USA.

In conclusion, it is the belief of the USA Government that this proposed tax contains possibilities for misunderstanding between our two countries which might well be detrimental to the broader interests of both. The USA Government desires to reiterate the hope, therefore, that the Canadian Government will decide not to proceed with its enactment into law.

MAGAZINE TAX

I am attaching a copy of telegram 1276 of July 9 from Washington in which there is quoted the text of a note from the State Department setting out formally the objections of the United States Government about the proposed magazine tax. I understand that members of the Government are now considering whether the proposal for this tax is to be maintained. As you are no doubt aware Mr. Harris has recently been entertaining the thought that it might be desirable to withdraw the proposal from consideration at this session of Parliament. In this connection I am attaching a copy of a memorandum to Mr. Harris from Mr. Plumptre which has been given to this Department on an informal and confidential basis.

I draw your attention, in particular, to the final paragraphs of this memorandum in which Mr. Plumptre reminds the Minister of Finance of the difficulties that would be involved should a decision be taken to withdraw the magazine tax in order to create a bargaining instrument with the United States in the commercial field. I am sure that I do not need to emphasize that from the point of view of this Department any such course would have very serious implications. In preliminary discussions which we have had with United States officials and in discussions which have taken place between members of the Government and representatives of the interested United States publications, the proposed tax has always been defended on strictly non-commercial grounds and, as Mr. Plumptre points out, a great deal has been made out of the fact that the intention behind our policy is to preserve "a basic and essential thread in the fabric of our national life".

A formal reply to the United States note will be drafted for your consideration when we are informed whether or not the Government proposes to go ahead with this tax. Since it is possible that Mr. Harris may raise this issue at this morning's Cabinet meeting I thought it might be helpful for you to know that the thinking of officials in this Department is in agreement with the views of officials in the Department of Finance as expressed in the attached memorandum to Mr. Harris. In view of the manner in which Mr. Plumptre's memorandum has been made available to us you may not wish to make direct reference to it in discussions with Mr. Harris or in Cabinet.[107]

MAGAZINE TAX

I attach a copy of a telegram from Washington (No. 1276 of July 9) which contains the text of the formal note on this subject which has been received by our Embassy in Washington. You will see from the introductory remarks that it was initialled by the senior officer of State Department (in the absence of Mr. Dulles himself), also that it was received by mail, i.e. by messenger, and that there was no discussion regarding it.

If, in view of developments in Parliament in recent weeks, the Government did decide to withdraw this proposal at this Session, it would be most helpful if I could know a bit in advance exactly what the tactics will be. These tactics will have to be taken into account in whatever we write and say to the Americans.

I hope you will not think it too presumptuous if I make some suggestions about tactics that you may want to keep in mind. When you first mentioned the possibility of withdrawal you suggested that this withdrawal would be based upon the fact that the Session had already dragged out unduly and that this particular issue showed signs of being quite contentious and therefore leading to further delay. In this regard it might perhaps be added that the problems confronting Canadian magazines had been developing and had been under study for a number of years and that it was more desirable to achieve a good and lasting solution and one that was widely acceptable rather than a quick solution.

If these were the grounds for withdrawal it would mean that the Canadian magazines would not feel that they had been thrown to the wolves; that the Government was still taking a serious interest in their problems and would attempt to reach some solution. Indeed after further consideration the Government might decide at some later stage to move forward with the proposal now before Parliament or something pretty close to it. There may be some advantage from the Government's point of view in not throwing the magazines over at any rate at this stage.

[107] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
This did not come up at Cabinet yesterday. L.B. P[earson] July 13, 1956.

Those of us in the Department who have worked on this problem pretty intensively over quite a long period would feel that there are really three choices and only three:

(a) allowing nature to take its course, which means that a good many of the remaining Canadian magazines of general interest will succumb over the next five or ten years;

(b) a tariff on magazines; and

(c) the tax on special editions in some form pretty closely resembling that which is before Parliament.

Whether we are right or wrong and whether or not we could devise some new and less contentious formula, the Government may well wish to leave its hands completely free for the future, including the possibility of coming back to the present proposal or something like it.

If the Government did follow this line of tactics, it follows that we should be fairly firm in our reply to the United States. They might be told in writing or orally at about the same time that you were making your statement in the House that, for this Session, the Government was not proceeding with the magazine tax. However, they could and should be given no assurance that the Government would not in due course proceed with it or with some other form of support for Canadian magazines which they might still find pretty unpleasant. Emphasis would, of course, be laid heavily on the fact that this was in no sense a measure of commercial protection in Canada but was designed to preserve a basic organ of public expression and opinion.

If this line were adopted it would, I think, exclude a different line which you suggested on the spur of the moment when I was in your office yesterday, i.e. that in withdrawing the tax we should attempt to get some quid pro quo from the United States in the commercial field. I have had a preliminary talk about this with one or two people in Trade and Commerce and other Departments and their feeling is (quite apart from the tactical arguments produced above) that the United States Government just before an election is in no position to give us any useful commercial commitments — and even if it were willing to give them it is doubtful whether we could rely on their execution. Moreover, if we on our side reached some sort of a bargain at this stage it would tie the hands of the Government in attempting to deal with the problem at some later stage.

Further, I do not think that we can bargain with the United States in relation to the withdrawal of the magazine tax without this fact becoming known to certain powerful U.S. interests (Reader's Digest and Time). It might then be made to appear that the Canadian Government had been bought or bullied out of pursuing a policy which it had announced as being designed to preserve "a basic and essential thread in the fabric of our national life".

Louis Couillard, who in the absence of our Ambassador is in charge of these matters at our Embassy in Washington, is coming into town later today and I hope to bring him to see you before his departure after lunch tomorrow (Thursday). It would be most helpful to both of us if we could have your further ideas about tactics at this time, even though the basic decision whether or not to withdraw the proposal had not yet been made.

MAGAZINE TAX

We have prepared the following note as a reply to the United States note of July 9 on the proposed magazine tax. We are sending you the text now for your information only. You should not present this note until we send you further instructions.

2. Text (after usual introduction and appropriate references) is as follows:

"What appear to be the main points in the note of the Acting-Secretary of State and in the comments made earlier by Mr. Prochnow to Mr. Couillard have been singled out and the views of the Canadian Government on these points are set out as follows:

This tax will hit important and sensitive elements among United States publishers

3. It is the nature of the situation that this should be the case. Canada obviously cannot achieve the object of preserving a nucleus of national magazines in Canada, however, without affecting unfavourably the position of the publishers of the by-product editions. Further, the special editions represent only a small part of the total operation of the United States publishers concerned; even if they decided to abandon their special editions their total profits would be little changed.

It is unlike Canada to impose such a tax suddenly, without prior consultation

Although the Canadian Government is aware that some United States interests are adversely affected by this measure, it is nevertheless a domestic excise tax about which Canada has no obligations to consult such as do exist in the field of bound tariffs. Further, it is traditional Canadian constitutional practice that all budgetary measures such as excise taxes are announced in this manner. Any departure from this long established practice would be most extraordinary and would be difficult to justify to parliament.

This tax offends against principles of commercial policy espoused by Canada and the United States, in contrast with the kind of action the State Department took with regard to the Maryland beer legislation

5. This is not a question of commercial policy. No tariff or other barrier to the free entry of United States magazines is involved. The proposed tax should be understood as an attempt to prevent the disappearance of the limited number of magazines of general interest that are still published in Canada. The reason for attempting this is that the Canadian Government believes that Canadian magazines serve useful purposes, not least in helping to formulate throughout Canada considered and critical opinions on public affairs. It would be unlikely that by-products of magazines from other countries would fill this role.

6. It is not considered that the Maryland beer question has any relevance to this problem. What might be compared with the action the State Department took with respect to Maryland is Canadian treatment of United States investment in Canada; it is unlikely that the United States has any reason to be dissatisfied with this treatment.

7. It has been recognized for many years and in many countries that media of information, entertainment and culture cannot always be treated in strictly commercial terms. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for example, probably owes its existence to the acceptance of this principle. The same principle seems to be implicit in the provision of the United States Federal Communications Act of 1934 which prohibits the issuance of a broadcasting license to any corporation that is more than 25% foreign owned.

This proposal discriminates against the United States

8. The tax will apply to special editions whenever they are produced, and no matter what the nationality of the parent magazine. It is true that most of the special editions sold in Canada are by-products of United States magazines, and it is inevitable therefore that most of the magazines subject to this excise tax will be of United States parentage, but the tax will certainly not discriminate on national grounds.

Statistical information shows that the position of Canadian magazines has improved, not deteriorated, and there is therefore no need for this measure

9. When examining the statistical evidence it is important to remember that while the Canadian Government is, of course, concerned about the vitality of all Canadian publications, it is particularly concerned about the continued existence of Canadian magazines of general interest and national circulation. There are only about a dozen magazines of general interest in Canada, including two "special editions". They are:

Canadian Home Journal
Canadian Homes & Gardens Chatelaine
Maclean's
Mayfair
La Revue Moderne
La Revue Populaire
Le Samedi
Liberty
Reader's Digest (Special Editions in French & English)
Saturday Night
Time (Special Edition)

10. In 1948 the advertising revenues of these twelve magazines amounted to $7,983,574, of which the two "special editions" accounted for 18.1%. In 1955 the advertising revenues of the group had risen to $17,434,225. Of this total the two "special editions" took 36.8%, their share of the total having risen steadily each year. It is true that the total advertising revenues and the circulation of the ten Canadian magazines in this group have increased over this period, but costs have increased even more. Of course, some of the Canadian publishers have been making reasonable profits in recent years, but these are due to their activities other than publishing the national general interest magazines. For example, they publish specialized trade journals and they do job-printing. The important fact is that the publication of the national magazines of general interest is unprofitable. Those published in English in 1955 taken together made no profit at all, but a loss amounting to about 2.4% of their total revenues. The position of those published in French is similar.

There is a serious danger that this example will be copied by other countries

11. It is not for the Canadian Government to judge whether the publication of special editions of United States magazines in other countries is desirable or undesirable. However, the Canadian Government was aware of this issue before it considered the proposed tax. Accordingly, the Minister of Finance went to some length to explain the unique situation that prevails in Canada. The Latin American countries, about which Mr. Prochnow was worried, do not share with the United States either a common language or (except for Mexico) a common long and very open border nor do the regular editions of American magazines represent four-fifths of circulation in those countries, as they do in Canada. These facts would seem to place them in a much different position from that of Canada. The Canadian Government could hardly be expected to weigh this factor heavily as compared with the question of whether or not Canadian national magazines were to survive.

12. In view of these various considerations the Canadian Government hopes that the Government of the United States will understand and appreciate the action which the Canadian Government proposes."

EXCISE TAX; CANADIAN EDITIONS OF FOREIGN MAGAZINES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 19)

26. The Minister of Finance said that a final decision had now to be reached as to whether or not the excise tax on Canadian editions of foreign magazines, announced in the budget speech, should be recommended to Parliament at this session. Most daily newspapers were opposing the tax because they were afraid it might be extended in the future to syndicate columns and because they might get less advertising. On the other hand, weeklies and Canadian magazines were asking for more protection, although not necessarily supporting the particular form of protection given by the excise tax.

The arguments used to oppose the tax had been that it resulted in discrimination against a few U.S. magazines, that it was an attempt to restrict the freedom of the press and that it would be ineffective as a measure to protect Canadian magazines. According to certain reports, advertising companies intended, if the tax were levied, to cut that part of their budget devoted to Canadian magazines in order to maintain their advertising programme in Canadian editions of U.S. magazines. The Conservatives would oppose the tax and support tariff protection against all U.S. magazines.

The arguments in favour were that the tax was merely a protection against dumping, that it could be effective in discouraging other U.S. magazines to publish Canadian editions and that it was the only practical suggestion that had been made to help Canadian magazines. In spite of the opposition of the Conservatives, there would be no real difficulty in getting Parliament to approve the special tax.

27. During the discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) Many people opposed this tax on publications as a matter of principle. It could be interpreted as a departure from the traditional free-trade policy which could not be reconciled with discrimination in favour of a particular industry. If the tax were imposed, it might be used by the U.S. as a pretext to resort to further discriminatory practices against Canadian imports.

(b) The tax had an important significance in maintaining organs of opinion in Canada. If nothing were done in this field, it would be difficult for Canadian magazines, expressing Canadian opinion on Canadian affairs to survive. However, if the objective were protection of Canadian magazines against U.S. influence, then the proposed tax would not achieve that purpose and it would be necessary to take some drastic action against all U.S. magazines.

(c) It was impossible under G.A.T.T. to take general tariff action. In any case, a tariff on imported magazines in general was inconsistent with traditional Liberal policy. On the other hand, Canadian magazines needed protection because all except one had lost money during the last year and their share of the advertising dollar had decreased recently. While it could be argued that the proposed tax would have no great practical effect on the present situation, it would be a deterrent for other U.S. magazines planning to publish Canadian editions.

(d) If the tax were withdrawn at this time, it would be quite impossible to re-introduce it in its present form at another session and no practical alternative had been suggested.

(e) It was most undesirable for the government to withdraw a budget measure of this kind because of the type of criticism this one had provoked.

28. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Finance on the advisability of asking Parliament at this session to approve an excise tax on Canadian editions of foreign magazines and deferred decision until a subsequent meeting.

MAGAZINE TAX

I was glad to receive in advance the text of the proposed reply to the State Department's note of July 9. You have not asked for my comments but in view of the very special treatment accorded this subject by the Administration and the political significance given it here, I venture a number of suggestions.

2. As the Canadian reply now stands it is a firmly worded answer to the USA note of July 9 and to the oral statements made by Prochnow to Couillard on March 29, as well. I agree that Prochnow's assertions must be answered. But I do not think that the best course is to answer them in our formal reply to the USA note. You will have noticed that this document is unclassified. If our reply is to have the same status, as the State Department would presumably expect, there would be no restrictions on circulation of the two documents. Even if we were to propose limitations upon the availability of the exchange, it would in my opinion be unrealistic — in view of the special pressures that have developed here — to expect that it would not be shown to powerful supporters of the Administration outside the Government. For this reason it seems to me wiser to confine our written reply to the points made in the USA note and to answer Prochnow's additional arguments by oral comments when the note is presented.

3. The USA note reflects a much less emotional attitude than that adopted by Prochnow in his interview with Couillard. As well, its general tone seems to indicate that the question has now been elevated to a higher plane than that on which it was handled in March. For these reasons it seems to me that the kind of reply most appropriate and effective to the USA note would not be so appropriate, nor so telling, with respect to Prochnow's comments — and vice versa. It would, therefore, be better to separate our responses so as to be able to deal more fittingly with the formal USA case and the Deputy Under-Secretary's oral outburst.

4. Acceptance of my suggestion will necessitate substantial changes in the text of the Canadian reply as it is now drafted. You might wish also to give me written instructions as to the oral points to be made in rebutting Prochnow's assertions. At any rate, it is my strong opinion, having in mind the use that may be made of this correspondence and the kind of people in this country whose opposition has been most vehement, that our written responses should be limited to only those arguments the USA has put on paper.

5. Please let me know as far in advance as possible when our reply is to be made and whether the text I now have is to be altered.

I am grateful for your comments on the proposed reply to the United States note of July 7. While I do not see any reason why any of the points in our draft note would have embarrassed us had they been made public, I agree that it might be better to address our written reply to the points contained in the United States note. There might otherwise be a danger that the State Department would think it necessary to send us in a further note a fuller statement of their objections.

2. We have redrafted our proposed note accordingly. You should still hold it until further notice. We may be able to give you further instructions on Tuesday August 7. We would agree that Mr. Prochnow's comments should be answered orally when the note is presented. For that purpose the text of our earlier draft note should be suitable. At your discretion these oral points could also be embodied in an aide mémoire.

3. Following is text of revised note. Begins. The Canadian Government has given careful consideration to the views expressed in the Acting Secretary of State's note of July 7 and the comments made earlier by United States officials on the Canadian Government's proposal to impose a tax on the advertising revenues of special Canadian editions of non-Canadian magazines.

4. The Canadian Government wishes to emphasize that this in no sense a question of commercial policy. No tariff or other barrier to the free entry of United States magazines is involved. The proposed tax should be understood as an attempt to prevent the disappearance of the limited number of magazines of general interest that are still published in Canada. The reason for attempting this is that the Canadian Government believes that Canadian magazines serve useful purposes, not least in helping to formulate throughout Canada considered and critical opinions on public affairs. It would be unlikely that by-products of magazines from other countries could fill this role.

5. The Canadian Government has noted that the United States Government believes this measure will have a discriminatory effect in practice and will be injurious to established United States business interests. The tax will apply to special editions wherever they are produced, and no matter what the nationality of the parent magazine. It is true that most of the special editions sold in Canada are by-products of United States magazines, and it is inevitable therefore that most of the magazines subject to this excise tax will be of United States parentage, but the tax will certainly not discriminate on national grounds.

6. It is in the nature of the situation that established United States business interests will be adversely affected. Canada obviously cannot achieve the object of preserving a nucleus of national magazines in Canada without affecting unfavourably the position of the publishers of the by-product editions. However, the special editions represent only a small part of the total operation of the United States publishers concerned; even if they decided to abandon their special editions their total profits would be little changed.

7. The Canadian Government has also noted that the United States Government believes this tax will set an undesirable precedent for other countries. The Canadian Government is not in a position to judge whether the publication of special editions of United States magazines in other countries is desirable or undesirable. However, the Canadian Government was aware of this issue before it considered the proposed tax. Accordingly, the Minister of Finance went to some length to explain the unique situation that prevails in Canada. Canada and the United States share a common language and a common long and very open border, and American magazines account for four-fifths of magazine circulation in Canada. No other country is at all likely to find itself in this position.

8. In view of these various considerations the Canadian Government hopes that the Government of the United States will understand and appreciate the action which the Canadian Government is recommending to Parliament. Ends.

EXCISE TAX ON CANADIAN EDITIONS OF FOREIGN MAGAZINES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE AUG. 2)

9. The Minister of Finance pointed out that if it were decided to abandon the plan to impose an excise tax on Canadian editions of foreign magazines at this session, it would be quite impossible to recommend the same tax at another session. While the Conservatives would probably oppose the tax and suggest tariff action as an alternative, other opposition parties would probably not take a definite stand.

10. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The U.S. government had protested against the proposed tax on several occasions. The Canadian government had undertaken to consult with the State Department before imposing the tax and would have to send a reply to the note received on this matter. This should be done before introducing the resolution in the House.

(b) It was undesirable to back away from the intention announced in the budget speech, although it could be embarrassing to impose the tax. Although there was nothing intrinsically wrong about such a tax, it could be used by the U.S. as a pretext if they imposed new restrictions on Canadian imports and it would be interpreted as an attempt to restrict the freedom of the press. However, these objections were not too serious provided that the anti-dumping character of the tax would be clearly explained and emphasized.

(c) The revenues to be derived from the tax would probably not exceed $2 million and the Reader's Digest could perhaps introduce enough Canadian material not to be subjected to the tax. However, since the proposal had been announced, it seemed that Newsweek and Businessweek had both given up their plans to publish a Canadian edition and, if the tax were imposed, it would probably prevent the establishment of new Canadian editions. It was mainly in this way that it would help to protect all Canadian magazines including several trade journals.

11. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Finance on a proposed excise tax on Canadian editions of foreign magazines and agreed that such a tax be recommended to Parliament in its present form at this session.

MAGAZINE TAX

Shortly after 4 pm this afternoon I delivered to the Secretary of State a note [No. 486] based upon the text in your telegram E-1192 of August 6. Mr. Dulles was accompanied by Burke Elbrick, Acting Assistant-Secretary of European Affairs and by Herbert V. Prochnow, Deputy Under-Secretary for Economic Affairs.

2. I told the Secretary that the Canadian Government had given very careful considerations to arguments which had been advanced by the USA Government in their note and in informal conversations with members of this Embassy and that the strong feelings of the USA Government on this question had also been taken into account. It had been decided, however, to proceed with the proposed tax and that it was likely that the necessary legislation would be introduced into the House some time today.

3. Mr. Dulles said, speaking rather light-heartedly in view of the heavy pressures on him these days, that he regretted this decision and that he hoped that the Canadian Government would regard the imposition of the tax as an experiment and that this experiment would meet the same fate as had the USA experiment with prohibition!

4. At the same time as I presented the note, I left a paper which set out the statistical rebuttal of the USA argument that in view of the improved position of the Canadian magazines there was no need for the proposed tax. At the close of the interview I made an offer to Mr. Prochnow to rebut orally, either now or at some other convenient opportunity, the other arguments which he had presented during his conversation with Couillard in March. Prochnow appeared less than keen to accept my offer, but he said that in any event he would prefer to read the note first. I will ensure that at an early opportunity Prochnow's arguments are rebutted.

5. I should be grateful if you could let me know what arrangements might be suitable to you if the question of publication of the State Department's note and our note should arise.

Note du secrétaire d'état suppléant des États-Unis à l'Ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Note from Acting Secretary of State of United States to Ambassador in United States

Washington, August 20, 1956

The Acting Secretary of State presents his compliments to the Ambassador of Canada and has the honor to refer to the Ambassador's note of August 7, 1956, concerning the Canadian Government's intention to impose a 20 percent tax on the advertising revenues of special Canadian editions of non-Canadian magazines which are circulated in Canada.

The Acting Secretary wishes to express his appreciation of the Ambassador's explanation concerning the reasons for the proposed legislation and its relation to certain publishing ventures in Canada undertaken by various United States business interests.

The United States Government, nevertheless, regrets this decision of the Canadian government to press on with the proposed legislation and hopes that the Canadian Government will not long consider it necessary. Having in mind its unusual nature, the Acting Secretary ventures to anticipate that, in the event the measure becomes law, the Canadian Government will give the same careful attention to its effects on United States business interests as has already been paid to the formulation of the measure itself.

MAGAZINE TAX

I attach a copy of a note dated yesterday from the United States Ambassador here to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It embodies a renewed protest against the tax and expresses the hope that the Canadian Government "will take appropriate remedial action".

We shall be preparing an appropriate reply to this note.†

Meanwhile, I thought it would be worth noting that the tax appears to have been almost completely successful in achieving its specific objectives. I am not of course suggesting that the particular and powerful interests affected by the tax have not been successful in stirring up a great deal of objection to it. On the other hand we should not lose sight of the fact that the tax has

(a) caused the "grocery books" to cease the publication of their Canadian editions and revert to their previous policy of distributing the ordinary U.S. editions through our food stores;

(b) headed off the plans of Newsweek and of Business Week and the McGraw-Hill Organization for setting up special Canadian editions in Canada;

(c) redressed in some measure the competitive imbalance between the two big special editions — Time and Reader's Digest — and their Canadian competitors; this seems to be indicated by the figures you received recently from the Periodical Press Association.

This has been accomplished without in any way interfering with the traditional "free flow of ideas across international boundaries" (the accompanying U.S. note to the contrary notwithstanding) and without transgressing our international obligations (ditto).

Note de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Note by Embassy of United States

NOTE NO. 233 Ottawa, March 28, 1957

The Ambassador of the United States of America presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has the honor to refer to the note of the Canadian Ambassador to the United States of August 7, 1956, and the Acting Secretary of State's reply of August 20, 1956, concerning the twenty percent tax on the advertising revenues of special editions of non-Canadian magazines which are circulated in Canada.

The Government of the United States regrets that the tax has come into force with the prejudicial effects on the interests of the United States which the Acting Secretary of State mentioned in his note of July 7, 1956. The effects of the measure have been severe and, in this Government's view, unfortunate. The tax has forced several United States magazines to suspend their special editions and has substantially reduced the advertising revenue of others.

The United States Government believes that the advertising tax does not accord with the past efforts of both Governments to encourage the development of mutually beneficial commercial relations between the two nations and that it is likely to hinder efforts to promote the most desirable policies in the future.

The Government of the United States continues to believe that the Canadian tax may be used as a precedent for comparable actions by other countries to protect production of magazines and other goods. For this reason the tax conflicts with the policy, which the Governments of the United States, Canada and other nations have been trying to promote, of discouraging discriminatory internal taxation. To the extent that other Governments apply similar internal taxes, some of the progress made in recent years toward the liberalization of trade barriers against goods in general, and against goods of the "dollar area" in particular, may be nullified.

Quite apart from the commercial considerations involved, it is in the interest of both countries that there should be as free a flow of information as possible among the nations of the free world, including many nations where it is of paramount importance that the aims, ideals and activities of Canada, the United States and their allies should be better known. Repetitions of the Canadian action in other parts of the world could severely restrict one of the most effective methods by which such information is spread.

In addition to these conflicts with broad economic and cultural objectives, the United States Government believes that the Canadian tax is inconsistent with the basic principle of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, that internal taxes should not be imposed for protective purposes. Under Article III, which sets forth this principle, contracting parties are obligated not to apply internal taxes to imported or domestic products in a manner "so as to afford protection to domestic production." The Canadian tax is avowedly intended to protect the Canadian magazine industry from the competition of special editions of non-Canadian magazines. Injury to the special editions caused by the tax can be readily demonstrated. The intent and effect of the tax can be readily demonstrated. The intent and effect of the tax to protect the great bulk of the Canadian magazine industry exist, notwithstanding the fact that one of the special editions most seriously affected is printed within Canada.

It is the hope of the Government of the United States that the Canadian Government, acting in the light of the known effect of the tax and in consideration of its potential effects, will take appropriate remedial action.

173. PCO

Note du chef du Comité du Cabinet sur le projet de la voie maritime et d'hydroélectrique du Saint-Laurent pour le Cabinet

Memorandum by Chairman, Cabinet Committee on St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project, to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 37-56 Ottawa, February 21, 1956

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT: DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

A situation is now arising regarding the St. Lawrence Seaway channel excavations North and South of Cornwall Island that seems to require a general decision of principle by Cabinet even before the engineering data can be fully ascertained. The decision concerns the conditions on which Canada will allow the United States to carry out channel excavations in the vicinity of Cornwall Island and the necessity of informing the United States Government officially now of the Canadian views. If a decision is not taken at this time and Canada allows the matter to drift, it will not be possible to complete the dredging north and south of Cornwall Island before the end of 1958 as scheduled.

When Canada and the United States agreed on January 11, 1952,[108] to discuss steps leading to the approval by the International Joint Commission of the St. Lawrence Power Project, both governments did so on the understanding that, should the 1941 Seaway Agreement not be approved by the United States Congress, the Government of Canada would proceed with the construction of the Seaway. This decision was taken subsequent to the Canada-Ontario Agreement of 1951 which provided that Canada would do works solely for navigation and Ontario Hydro would undertake to do works solely for power and works common to power and navigation.

Among the works common to power and navigation are certain excavations North and South of Cornwall Island. These excavations were referred to in the applications made by both governments on June 30, 1952,[109] to the International Joint Commission, and they were shown in brown on the map† (copy attached) which also indicated that "final location of excavation" (of the parts shown in brown) "was to be determined from results of further model experiments and studies". The Applications by the governments detailing channel enlargements, and the Commission's Order of Approval, indicated that "downstream from the powerhouses, channel enlargements will be carried out for the purpose of reducing the tailwater level at the powerhouses". It was also stated that "final locations and cross-sections of these channel enlargements will be determined from further studies".

The International Joint Commission approved these Applications on October 29, 1952. As a result of further discussions between the two governments, an Exchange of Notes was concluded on August 17, 1954,[110] which indicated that the United States Government intended to participate in the St. Lawrence Seaway Project by constructing certain canals and locks as authorized under Public Law 358. Canada, for its part, indicated that it would construct the remaining works for a seaway from Montreal to Lake Erie, including a canal and lock at Iroquois. Public Law 358 (the so-called Wiley-Dondero Act of May 13, 1954) provides that the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation may construct "works solely for navigation" designated in the joint report of January 3, 1941. Accordingly, there seems to be some question whether the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation can undertake those works which are designated as works common to power and navigation. In addition, as between the Power Authority of the State of New York and the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, there appears to be no binding agreement similar to the Canada-Ontario Agreement of 1951 which determines who should carry out the works common to power and navigation below the Barnhart Island powerhouses. The United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, for its part, maintains that the Power entities are obliged to undertake the excavations North and South of Cornwall Island.

Some model studies have been carried on to determine what channel enlargements below the powerhouses are required for power purposes. These have not yet been completed. Other studies are just now being undertaken in Canada. At present, it appears that the Power entities are not anxious to undertake other than a minimum of channel excavations immediately adjacent to the tailrace. If the Power entities determine that the economics do not favour dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, it may mean that no ships other than shallow draft will be able to reach the locks on the United States side opposite Cornwall unless the United States Seaway Development Corporation or some combination of entities agreed to assume the burden of channel excavations in that area. The situation thus created would be clearly ridiculous.

Any dredging South of Cornwall Island in order to allow vessels to enter the United States locks opposite Cornwall Island will have an adverse effect upon the level or flow in the Canadian waters North of Cornwall Island. As the waters in the vicinity of the Island are boundary waters, both the United States and Canadian Governments are to be guided in their acts by the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. The first paragraph of Article III of that Treaty provides that neither government shall, except by a special agreement between them or by the approval of the International Joint Commission, make any use of or obstruct or divert waters so as to affect the "natural level or flow" of boundary waters on the other side of the line. The second paragraph of Article III states that the above provisions are not intended to limit the existing rights of both governments to carry on works for "the deepening of channels" for the benefit of commerce and navigation, provided such works are wholly on one side of the line and "do not materially affect the level or flow of the boundary waters" on the other side. It is clear that the dredging South of Cornwall Island will materially affect the level or flow of waters on the North side. The extent to which the levels or flow will be affected has not yet been fully determined.

It can be said, in summary, that the Order of the International Joint Commission dated October 29, 1952, was an Order for the development of the power potential of the International Section which was based on the assumption that Canada would do all the necessary navigation works. At that time, dredging North of Cornwall Island was necessary for navigation purposes. It now appears that with the navigation works being located by the United States South of Cornwall Island, the Power entities do not see that they would gain any benefit other than through dredging at the tail-race. Accordingly, no dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, other than that at the tail-race, is likely to be undertaken unless it is done by the United States Seaway Development Corporation, or some combination of entities, in order to gain access to the Robinson Bay Locks. Such dredging may, of course, produce some incidental benefits for the Power entities.

Two questions now arise. The first one is on what terms should the Government of Canada allow the United States to dredge South of Cornwall Island? The second question concerns the division of costs between the entities concerned or both countries.

Under Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, the Canadian Government can have this matter determined either by making Application to the International Joint Commission or by a special agreement with the United States Government. It appears that the second course, being the speedier, is to be preferred at this time.

In deciding upon the substance of the agreement, the Canadian Government could insist that the levels or flows be restored or it could agree that the levels or flows be not restored now, but that the United States give a guarantee that should Canada desire in future to build a navigation channel on its side at Cornwall, the United States gives its agreement in advance to such works. It seems, however, that such an agreement — which might be implemented in, say, 25 years' time — ought to be consigned in a more solemn manner than in an exchange of notes, otherwise it could be repudiated. The only satisfactory form for such an undertaking to be executed in the future would be a treaty requiring United States Senate approval. In view of past experience, this is not very feasible. If the agreement is to be executed immediately, however, it could take the form of an exchange of notes.

It therefore appears that, as regards dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, both countries are hostages to each other's fortunes in a way which would not exist in the future, and that the Canadian Government should require that any disturbance to the level and flow North of Cornwall Island caused by United States channel excavations South of Cornwall Island should be compensated in the form of a navigation channel North of Cornwall Island. In order to solve the problem for the future, such a navigation channel should be constructed now to at least the depth of the channels now being dug in the international section of the river. Therefore, it seems that both countries should reach a special agreement to ensure that a navigation channel is built now in the North Channel, and on the division of costs.

A study of estimates made separately by the United States Seaway Development Corporation and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority indicates that the total works North and South of Cornwall Island (including a navigation channel North of the Island) would cost about $28 million. It so happens that these works would be physically situated approximately half in Canada and half in the United States. If a division of costs on a 50-50 basis were agreed with the United States, it would assist the United States Seaway Development Corporation in remaining within its statutory budgetary limits. In addition, such a division might be acceptable to the United States because part of the works are to be done in "boundary waters" concerning which the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 provides that each country shall have "equal and similar rights". In so far as Canada is concerned, the costs (less benefits accruing to the Power entities) could be borne appropriately by Seaway tolls.

Recommendations

The Committee recommends that:

(a) diplomatic negotiations be undertaken with a view to reaching a special agreement with the United States regarding the channel excavations North and South of Cornwall Island, other than those at the tail race of the powerhouses;

(b) the agreement should provide that the compensating works North of Cornwall Island should take the form of channel excavations for deep water navigation purposes;

(c) the agreement may provide that Canada and the United States share equally the total cost of the excavations North and South of Cornwall Island, on the condition that provision is made for the carrying out by Canadian contractors and labour of approximately 50% of the work;

(d) the Canadian share of these channel excavations, less the contribution of the power authorities under (e) below, should be charged to Seaway tolls;

(e) the costs of the benefits accruing directly to the Power entities as a result of excavations North and South of Cornwall Island should be borne by them.[111]

DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

Following is the text of the memorandum to be handed to the State Department. Text Begins:

[111] Ces cinq recommandations ont été approuvées par le Cabinet le 23 février 1956.
These five recommendations were approved by Cabinet on February 23, 1956.

The question of channel excavations North and South of Cornwall Island has been discussed several times between the Canadian and United States authorities in recent months. Moreover, the St. Lawrence Seaway development corporation has recently raised the question of one or two specific items of dredging which it wishes to do in this area. These specific items must be considered in the light of the general question of dredging in the area of Cornwall Island. In order to ensure that delays over these excavations do not disrupt the schedule for the completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway project, it appears to be desirable that agreement should be reached and the excavations started in 1956.

2. The excavations required in the area of Cornwall Island for power purposes are described in Appendix "A" of the order of approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952. It now appears that these excavations for power purposes may be confined to the area immediately below the power houses. In this case excavations required for navigation purposes South of Cornwall Island, in order to give the required channel depths and to provide access to the Grass River Lock, would have to be carried out by one or both of the Seaway entities.

3. Excavations required to give access to the Grass River Lock in the international section of the St. Lawrence River would be made partly in United States territory and partly in Canadian territory. Aside from any effect which they might have on the level or flow of the boundary waters on the Canadian side of the South Cornwall channel, the excavations would result in a material alteration of the level or flow of the boundary waters on the Canadian side of the river in the North Cornwall channel. Accordingly, under Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty the excavations could be carried out only with the approval of the International Joint Commission or upon the conclusion of a special agreement between the two governments.

4. The Canadian Government suggests that there should be a special agreement in the form of an exchange of notes to provide for these excavations, as this would be a quicker and simpler procedure than an application to the International Joint Commission with the extensive public hearings which would probably result. Such an agreement could set out in general terms the character of the excavations to be made both North and South of Cornwall Island and the division of responsibility between the two countries for carrying out the work. The Seaway entities could be charged with the execution of the agreement.

5. With respect to the compensatory excavations in the North Cornwall channel, the Canadian Government is of the view that these excavations should take the form of a channel suitable for deep water navigation. The Canadian Government is prepared to seek with the United States Government a reasonable arrangement for dividing the responsibility for and the cost of the excavations between the two Seaway entities. DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

Following is the text of an aide mémoire handed to us late yesterday afternoon by Outerbridge Horsey, Director of the State Department's Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs. We will send some additional information on this subject in a following message. Text begins:

The US Government has considered the applications of the governments of the US and Canada to the International Joint Commission for the approval of the construction of the St. Lawrence power project in accordance with the controlled single-stage project (238-242) of January 3/41, the features of which are shown in the plan which was a part of the applications. It has also considered the International Joint Commission's order of approval of October 29/52, as well as licensing and other documentation related to the power project, and is of the opinion that the power entities are responsible for excavation in the Cornwall channels, just as they are responsible for excavations immediately below the Barnhart Island power houses.

The excavations in the Cornwall channels for which the US Government considers the power entities to be responsible are referred to as features 33 and 34 in the annex of the Canada-Ontario agreement of December 3/51, which cites the final report of 1942 on the St. Lawrence River project by the corps of engineers, US army. Excavations immediately below the Barnhart Island power houses constitute an entirely separate item as feature 32 of that report. The two power entities themselves have included $14,209,162 for Cornwall channel excavations in their cost estimates of their works based on January 1/54, price levels.

As a result of model tests in the US, it appears that excavations in the areas of features 33 and 34 result in increased benefits to power which would be in excess of the present day cost of channel excavations required for features 33 and 34. Furthermore, these results could be obtained without materially changing the natural distribution of flows between the channels North and South of Cornwall Island or the water levels contemplated under controlled single-stage project (238-242).

Also, it clearly appears that the provisions to be made for excavation by the Seaway entities solely for navigation in the eastern reach of the South Cornwall channel downstream from approximately Mile 110 would not affect the above mentioned water flow distribution or levels in both channels.

Since there would be a natural flow distribution and since water levels in both channels would be in accordance with the controlled single-stage project (238-242), which makes provision for excavations in the Cornwall channels by the two power entities, the US Government does not believe that there are circumstances warranting action other than a determination by the St. Lawrence River Joint Board of Engineers. The board was established by an exchange of notes of November 12/53, between the two governments for the review, coordination and approval of the plans, specifications and programs of the power entities for the construction of the works included in the project as approved, and further to assure the construction of these works as approved.

Accordingly, the US Government considers that the proper and most expeditions procedure would be for the two governments to direct their [...]ctions of the St. Lawrence River Joint Board of [...] power entities to submit plans and specifications [...] excavations in the Cornwall channels to the said Board.[112]. If further discussions between the two governments are necessary before such action can be taken, the Government of the US suggests, because of the time element involved in construction, that a meeting of representatives of the two governments be held at the earliest practicable date.

The division of responsibility and cost of excavations by the Seaway entities solely for navigation in the eastern reach of the South Cornwall channel downstream, from approximately Mile 110, appears to be a matter which could be arranged satisfactorily between the two Seaway entities.

With respect to the proposal that compensatory excavation in the North Cornwall channel should take the form of a channel suitable for deep water navigation, the US Government considers it necessary to study this matter in the light of the various factors which would be involved. Among these factors is the nature of the excavations which the St. Lawrence River Joint Board of Engineers considers to be the responsibility of the power entities. Consequently, it would appear to be additionally urgent that plans and specifications for excavations by the power entities in the Cornwall channels be submitted to the Board without further delay. Text ends.

Note de la Direction de l'Amérique

Memorandum by American Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 27, 1956

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT: DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

A meeting of the St. Lawrence group was held Tuesday, April 24, to discuss the State Department memorandum handed to the Canadian Embassy in Washington on April 18. Present were: Messrs. Côté and Patterson of Northern Affairs, Scott of Transport, Stead of Finance, Cunningham of Privy Council Office, Chevrier, Gavsie, West and Ripley of the Seaway Authority, General McNaughton and Mr. MacCallum of the IJC and Carter and Harman of External Affairs. Mr. Carter acted as Chairman.

2. Mr. Carter opened the meeting with a brief analysis of the United States memorandum, pointing out that it contained two new arguments to bolster the U.S. contention that power should do all the dredging, viz. the provision of $14 million for this work, in the power entities' estimates, and the results of model tests. He mentioned that the Canadian stand on the provision of 27-foot navigation in the north channel would be jeopardized if we were to agree with the U.S. interpretation. He suggested the meeting might discuss the significance of the U.S. position and the attitude the Canadian representatives might take at the proposed intergovernmental talks on the subject.

3. Mr. Chevrier recalled that he had been assured by Mr. Anderson (then U.S. Assistant Secretary of Defence) that the U.S. authorities had no concern whatever with the form of the north channel dredging and that if the Canadian Government wished this to be suitable for deep water navigation, the U.S. would not object. Mr. Chevrier felt therefore that the new U.S. memorandum was an attempt to prevent such a development, and he suggested that we should disagree strongly with the U.S. position as given in the memorandum. He also took issue with the method of action suggested by the State Department, stating that it was not for the Joint Board of Engineers to rule on works intended for navigation, as the Board's functions were limited by the IJC Order of Approval to those concerning power.

[112] Les crochets comprendraient la partie du texte qui manque à l'original, un des coins de celui-ci ayant été déchiré.
The material in square brackets indicates the portion of the text missing from the original, which has been torn in one corner.

4. Mr. Côté suggested the meeting consider the relative positions of the two memoranda. It was apparent, he said, that the U.S. Government wished to reject our contention that part of the dredging is for navigation purposes. He agreed with Mr. Chevrier that we should disagree with the U.S. position, and suggested that it was quite improper for the U.S. Government to be basing its case on an extraterritorial document, the Canada-Ontario Agreement of 1951. He said we must, however, recognize the difficulty of the U.S. Government's position, bound as it is by the terms of the Wiley Act, and unwilling for political motives to seek additional funds from Congress. Our reply should take these circumstances into account.

5. General McNaughton spoke about the interpretation of the two governments' applications to the IJC and of the IJC Order of Approval. He said that there was no justification to think that the Order required the power entities to do any dredging below the Barnhart Island power houses that is not required for power purposes.

6. At this point Mr. Carter asked whether it was important that the dredging operations in this area be begun this year, to which Mr. West replied he thought they should, in order to ensure completion by the end of 1958.

7. Mr. Chevrier raised the question of "benefits to power" and pointed to the widely divergent estimates which had been submitted on these benefits. He mentioned particularly the estimate of $25 million which he had recently received from Mr. Adams of the Federal Power Commission and which seemed a great amount.

8. At Mr. Chevrier's request, Mr. Ripley spoke about the model tests which have been conducted at the National Research Council. He stated that these had been based on the premise that the works were intended for navigation purposes. He described the most recent tests as being a combination of U.S. Plan 2, for the navigation channel south of Cornwall Island, and Canadian Plan 8 for compensatory channel. The total costs of this project would be about $26 million, divided as follows:

South Channel	$16.8 million	United States	$ 9.6 million
North Channel	9.2 million	Canada	16.1 million

From this plan power would definitely gain 1 1/4 feet in head of water, and perhaps (depending on further tests) 1 1/2 feet.

9. Mr. Chevrier mentioned that the Seaway Authority had received requests from their U.S. counterpart for permission to begin the dredging from Mile 110 to the international boundary, which they consider they are authorized under the Wiley Act to do (as works "solely for navigation"), and for which $3.7 million are available. The Authority has discouraged these requests, however, thinking that this dredging should be part of an integrated plan for the whole Cornwall Island reach. The $3.7 million could then be used as the SLSDC's contribution to the total costs.

10. Mr. Carter foresaw the possibility of a general agreement among the four interested parties on this basis, with which suggestion Mr. Chevrier agreed. Mr. Chevrier went on to outline the tentative division of costs worked out informally by the Authority. This was based on the SLSDC being able to provide up to $4 million, and the power entities $15 million between them. This would leave an expenditure of about $7 million for the SLSA. (Mr. Stead pointed out that this was a change from the previous 50-50 split between seaway entities.) The $15 million "power" contribution appeared to be based on a calculation of 1 1/2 feet of additional head of water at $10 million a foot, a figure which had been used informally by Hydro engineers in their calculations on the Islington models.

11. General McNaughton pointed out that there must be some satisfactory and realistic basis on which the benefit to power can be calculated.[113] He believed that the combined staffs of HEPCO and PASNY in Toronto had worked out a figure, but Dr. Holden of HEPCO had been unwilling to divulge this to him in informal conversation. He said he thought that the $5 million Mr. Moses had expressed willingness to pay was merely an opening bid.

12. Mr. Côté suggested a plan of action, involving first a reply to the U.S. disagreeing strongly with the terms of their memorandum, followed, if power so wished, by a submission by the power entities of limited dredging plans to the Joint Board and followed subsequently by talks with the Ontario authorities to ascertain how "reasonable" they and PASNY will be about contributing something to the costs to compensate for the benefits power will receive from the excavations.

13. It was suggested that any agreement with Ontario might be a part of the revision contemplated to the Canada-Ontario Agreement of 1951. In this connection Mr. Scott suggested that Hydro might wish to calculate its benefit from the dredging in terms of "saleable power", that is, capitalizing the value of 1 1/4 feet of head on the basis of the contract prices current when the power house begins producing. Hydro might therefore be unwilling to give an estimate now.

14. It became apparent that little progress could be made on a definition of a four-way division of costs until a satisfactory estimate was obtained of the benefits to power. It was thought that this should be sought from Dr. Hearn of HEPCO before he leaves for Europe at the end of April. After discussion, it was decided that Messrs. Scott, Côté, Carter and Cunningham should call upon Dr. Hearn later this week, and that Mr. Marler should be asked to arrange the meeting. The opportunity should be taken then to inform Hydro of recent developments in our discussions with the Americans and to obtain Dr. Hearn's views on the subject.

15. When the views and estimates are obtained from Hydro, the meeting will be reconvened to discuss the text of a reply to the U.S. memorandum.

Gen McN[aughton] referred to estimates made by hydro re Iroquois work — $12.4 million for a foot of head [T. LeM. Carter]

DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

My immediately following telegram contains the text of a memorandum on this question. It is a reply to the United States memorandum of April 18, the text of which was conveyed in your telegram under reference. We will telephone you when it receives approval of Mr. Marler, so that you can deliver it to State Department.

2. The opening paragraphs of the memorandum are intended to refute the arguments concerning responsibility for dredging North and South of Cornwall Island as set out in the U.S. memorandum. We have made a study of the documents and are convinced they do not support the U.S. contention that the power entities are responsible for this work. The memorandum accordingly re-affirms our view that the basic requirement of this dredging is for navigation purposes, although we acknowledge that the power entities should contribute an amount corresponding to the benefits they would receive. You will recall that there was no reference to such a contribution by the power entities in our memorandum of February 28 for the reasons set out in paragraph 8 of our telegram X-344.†

3. The memorandum makes more specific our general offer to share the costs of the dredging. We also transmit for the information of the U.S. Government, the calculations we have received from Hydro, but in so doing we do not endorse these calculations and you should make this clear.

4. In handing over the memorandum, you should emphasize again that acceptance of the Canadian position on excavations for deep water navigation in the north channel is an essential part of any settlement of this question. This is the aspect of the whole question to which we attach the greatest importance.

5. We share the U.S. concern that failure to agree on this subject may delay the St. Lawrence project and we accordingly would be glad to have a meeting of federal officials concerned on each side, at several days' notice. We would agree to a meeting either in Washington or Ottawa, but would prefer Ottawa.

DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

Following is the text of a memorandum to be handed to the State Department. Text begins:

The Canadian Government regrets that it is unable to agree with the United States Government's interpretation of the documents relating to the division of responsibility between the Seaway and power entities for dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, namely, that in the light of all the documents the power entities are responsible for the channel excavations corresponding to features 33 and 34 in the final report of 1942 by the United States Army Corps of Engineers.

2. The exchange of notes of June 30, 1952, envisaged that Canada would undertake the construction of all the navigation works in the International Rapids section. When Canada agreed at that time to make a contribution of $15 million to the power entities, it made this offer in respect of the works described in paragraph 4 of Annex A of the Canada-Ontario Agreement of 1951 and in Section 8 of the two governments' applications to the International Joint Commission. Neither paragraph 4 of Annex A nor Section 8 of the applications contains any reference to features 33 and 34 which were listed in paragraph 5 of Annex A. Indeed, the Order of Approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, includes specifically all the works common to navigation and power except features 33 and 34. With respect to excavations downstream from the powerhouses, the order of approval provides merely that "channel enlargements will be carried out for the purpose of reducing the tail-water level at the powerhouses".

3. With the Wiley-Dondero Act a new situation was created under which the United States declared its intention to construct the navigation works in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River. No provision was then made by the United States for the construction of features 33 and 34, which are necessary to provide for navigation between the Grass River Lock and Lake St. Francis, but which also benefit power. In the Canadian view, it would be reasonable for the power entities to contribute to the cost of the excavations North and South of Cornwall Island an amount corresponding to the benefits they would receive.

4. In this connection, the Canadian authorities wish to transmit some calculations which have been furnished informally by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. The Commission has calculated that if, for the purposes of the power project only, the power entities were to undertake excavations to lower the tail water level at the powerhouses, the economic limit for expenditures for these excavations (in addition to normal excavations at the tail-race only) would be of the order of $8.5 million to $9.5 million. This expenditure would result in lowering the tail water level 1.24 feet. The Commission has indicated that such a sum would be an equitable contribution by the power entities towards excavations primarily for navigation purposes, which would lower the tail water level to the same extent.

5. The Canadian Government is concerned lest delays in settling this question prevent the completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway and power project on schedule, and accordingly it is prepared to agree to an equal division of the costs of these excavations between Canada and the United States. It has been estimated that the total cost of these works, including those in the South channel downstream from Mile 110, would be $26 million. The Canadian Government is willing to bear $13 million, less one-half the amount the power entities would contribute for the benefits they receive.

6. As the excavations North and South of Cornwall Island for navigation purposes are not adequately covered by the Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, either a new application to the International Joint Commission or a special agreement between the two governments is required. In view of the urgency of settling the question, the latter is preferable. With respect to the compensatory excavations in the North Cornwall channel, the Canadian Government reiterates the view set out in the memorandum of February 28, and previously expressed on the official level at a meeting in Ottawa on June 17, 1955,[114] that these should take the form of a channel suitable for deep water navigation.

7. As there is a substantial difference between the views expressed on this subject, the Canadian Government agrees that an early meeting of representatives of the two governments should take place, in order to discuss the whole question. Text ends. Message ends.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 14, 1956

ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT: DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

A meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on the St. Lawrence was held Monday, May 7, to discuss a possible reply to the United States memorandum of April 18, in the light of additional opinions and information received from officials of the Ontario Hydro. Present were Messrs. Côté and Patterson of Northern Affairs, Scott of Transport, Stead of Finance, Lamontagne and Cunningham of Privy Council Office, Chevrier, Gavsie and West of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, MacCallum of the International Joint Commission, and Carter and Harman of External Affairs. Mr. Lamontagne acted as chairman.

2. After a review of the problem by the Chairman, Mr. Scott reported on the visit of officials to HEPCO in Toronto, of Dr. Holden's subsequent consultation with PASNY in New York and his visit to Ottawa last Friday. Dr. Holden had informed officials that HEPCO and PASNY considered the additional 1.24 feet of head worth to them between $8.5 million and $9 million. He had asked Mr. Moses not to inform other interested parties of this offer until it had been discussed in Ottawa. Mr. Scott calculated that with a power contribution of $9 million, and with a Canadian Government contribution of $9 million for the 27-foot north channel, it would be possible to divide the remaining $8 million equally between the seaway entities.

3. The Chairman pointed out that this was not in accord with the Cabinet decision of February 23, but Messrs. Stead and Gavsie thought it could be justified to the Canadian public in view of the special Canadian interest in the north channel. Mr. Chevrier suggested that instead, a special offer should be made on the basis of the Cabinet decision. The Chairman agreed, pointing out that under the Boundary Waters Treaty the United States would be responsible for all these works, and that the Canadian Government offer to pay one-half was therefore very generous.

4. The Chairman suggested that there appeared to be three methods of dividing the costs:

(a) in accord with the Cabinet decision, a division equally between the two countries, each paying $13 million, and in effect being reimbursed by the power entities $4.5 million to $5 million each;

(b) Canada paying one-half ($13 million) of the total, and the power entities and the SLSDC sharing the other half;

(c) using a calculation of $6 million for the navigation channel north of the Island, the Canadian Government might pay that, and the remaining $20 million be split equally between the four interested entities.

5. Mr. Gavsie raised the question of U.S. contractors working on the Canadian side of the boundary under these schemes. He pointed out that under the arrangements made for building the Pollys Gut Bridge, the Government had been unwilling to have this happen, and preferred to assume responsibility for building the half of the bridge which lies in Canadian territory. Mr. Chevrier commented that it had been the Government's policy with regard to the whole St. Lawrence Project to have all work in Canadian territory done by Canadian contractors and Canadian labour. Mr. Carter mentioned that in an early draft of the February memorandum to Cabinet there had been provision for Canada to assume the costs of the 27-foot north channel quite apart from an equal division of the total costs less the power contribution. This had, however, not found favour and had been omitted from subsequent drafts.

6. The discussion returned to the political and financial difficulties of the U.S. Seaway Corporation. The Chairman mentioned that the Canadian Government also was under fire regarding the seaway and might be expected to be criticized for letting U.S. contractors do work in Canadian territory. It was pointed out, however, that the United States does all the dredging in the Upper Lakes.

7. Mr. Carter suggested the meeting might wish to give some critical thought to the Hydro estimate of about $10 million for the power contribution. This matter was discussed and as there were conflicting methods of estimating the benefits to power from navigation dredging at Cornwall Island, it was thought advisable to seek the advice of Mr. R.A.C. Henry as to the proper evaluation of these benefits. A meeting with Mr. Henry was arranged for Tuesday, May 8.

8. The meeting then discussed the draft memorandum† to the Cabinet Committee, which had been prepared by Mr. Côté. After considerable discussion, it was decided that the Cabinet Committee should not be approached at present, but that the Embassy in Washington should present a further memorandum to the State Department re-stating the Canadian position, making more clear the offer to pay one-half the total cost which was stated generally in the previous memorandum, and submitting the estimate received from Hydro. It was also thought that the new memorandum should agree to a meeting of governmental representatives to discuss the whole question in the near future.

DREDGING NORTH AND SOUTH OF CORNWALL ISLAND

Wednesday afternoon we delivered to Mr. George Vest of the State Department's Canadian Desk, the memorandum given in your telegram X876 of May 10. In our oral comments we emphasized that the acceptance of the Canadian Government's position on excavations for deep water navigation in the north channel was an essential part of any settlement. We said also that the Canadian Government did not endorse the calculations of the Ontario Hydroelectric Power Commission, which were contained in our memorandum.

2. Vest's comments, which were very frank (and, we think, encouraging from the Canadian point of view) went as follows. Referring first of all to the arguments set out in our memorandum concerning the division of responsibility between Seaway and power entities for the dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, Vest indicated that he was not surprised by the line we had followed. He reminded us, however, that in his government's view, strong arguments could be mustered to show that the power entities alone were responsible for these excavations. Vest then indicated, referring to the possibility of a general settlement, that speaking most informally and on the understanding that his comments would be reported as a preliminary State Department view to be kept strictly within the Canadian Government, he could not help but think that a mutually satisfactory settlement would be reached, despite the fact that both sides now hold opposite views on the interpretation of the relevant documents. (We take this to mean that although the US Government remain convinced of the validity of their position on the responsibility issue, nevertheless, in order not to delay construction of the Seaway, they will not obstruct a settlement by insisting on that position.

3. Vest said that to make an agreement on the Cornwall Island dredging "fit into the past pattern" of exchanges between the two governments, the US Government would probably wish to have the agreement say that they have no objection to the Canadian proposal to dredge a 27 ft. channel North of Cornwall Island, provided that this dredging does not affect the level and flow of waters in the South channel. (Such a statement might give the impression that the US Government is simply acquiescing in a proposal which the Canadian Government could have carried out with or without the agreement or consent of the US Government. The creation of that impression might ease some of the domestic difficulties which the Administration have anticipated in connection with our proposal.)

4. While speaking on this point Vest remarked that the State Department's view was that the tail race dredging and the dredging North and South of Cornwall Island had already been authorized by the terms of the International Joint Commission's Order of Approval of October 29/52. He added that the implication of that view, if it were agreed, would be that there was no need for either another reference to the International Joint Commission or a special agreement between the two governments. We said that on this point the views of the two governments differed. Vest went on to say that some US engineers were firmly of the opinion that the construction of the 27 ft. navigation channel North of Cornwall Island could be carried out in such a way that the dredging would not affect the level and flow of water in the South channel that would exist after the necessary navigation dredging had been done there. Vest asked if we knew whether the Canadian engineers were of the same opinion and when we replied that we had no idea, he asked if we could try to obtain information on this point for him. He said that if this opinion were shared by engineers of both sides, it would "smooth the path" for an agreement between the two governments. We said we would ask for this information but that we were doubtful whether it was available.

5. It has occurred to us that if it is indeed possible and feasible for Canada to construct a 27 ft. channel north of Cornwall Island without disturbing the level and flow of water in the South channel, the immediate conclusion that the US authorities would draw is that there is no need for Canada to construct the 27 ft. channel now, since we will be perfectly free to do it at any time without either a reference to the IJC or a special agreement with the US Government. We have received no indication that the US authorities will attempt to persuade Canada to that view, but obviously if they could, the way would immediately be opened for them to suggest that construction of the 27 ft. channel North of Cornwall Island be deferred. If the construction were deferred, the effect might be to ease the financial difficulties foreseen by Mr. Castle and the political difficulties expected by the Administration.

6. Vest noted, with respect to the proposed contribution of the power entities, that the possible contribution of $8.5 million to $9.5 million envisaged by HEPCO for the two power entities was of the same order as that apparently contemplated by PASNY. PASNY, in their discussions with the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, have been speaking, it seems, in terms of a possible contribution by the two power entities of $8 million ($4 million from PASNY, $4 million from HEPCO). Vest observed that the figure of $26 million used in the 6th paragraph of our memorandum was the same as that which had been used by the US authorities in their own discussions. Assuming (a) the total cost of all the dredging to be $26 million, and (b) a total contribution by the two power entities of $9 million, and using the formula suggested in the 5th paragraph of our memorandum, Vest calculated that the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation would be expected to provide $8.5 million. Vest said that although he did not know for certain, he seriously doubted whether the SLSDC would be able to provide that amount of money. He thought that the absolute maximum the SLSDC would be able to contribute would be about $5 million, and he expected that Mr. Castle would soon inform PASNY that their previous suggestion that the two power entities might contribute a total of $8 million was not acceptable to the SLSDC. Continuing, Vest said that if the US Government accept the concept that the power entities should contribute "an amount corresponding to the benefits they would receive" (paragraph 3 of our memorandum) the US engineers calculations indicated that since the power entities would reap 60 percent of the benefits accruing from dredging North and South of Cornwall Island, they (PASNY and HEPCO together) should be expected to contribute a total of $13.6 million. On that basis and using the Canadian cost sharing formula, the contribution by the SLSDC would be $5.2[115] million, (the same as the Canadian Government's share). You will notice that this figure is very close to the $5 million maximum that Vest thinks the SLSDC will be able to contribute.

7. Later in the conversation Vest came back to the question of the estimated total costs of these excavations (paragraph 6 of our memorandum) and he asked whether it would be possible for us to obtain for him an indication of exactly what excavations are included in the figure $26 million. He asked specifically whether, in the Canadian view, this figure includes the costs of "extra dredging" required to construct a 27 ft channel North of Cornwall Island; (ie, the costs over and above the costs of whatever compensatory dredging would be required to restore the level and flow in the North channel.) Vest said that he would be most grateful to receive this information, but that he would understand if you preferred not to provide it.

8. The significance of this information for the US Government became evident later in the conversation when Vest emphasized that the US authorities are strongly opposed to having these "extra dredging" costs included in the toll base. He noted that our memorandum did not touch on this point. He said that the US authorities thought that the dredging of a 27 ft channel North of Cornwall Island could be "explained" (albeit not easily) in this country. But the explanation would be made infinitely more difficult (and perhaps impossible) if the costs of this "extra dredging" had to be recovered from Seaway tolls, since this arrangement would present the administration with a serious domestic problem. Vest mentioned specifically that US shipping interests, who ultimately would have to bear at least part of these costs, could be expected to object loud and long and the Administration apparently is not prepared to invite their criticism.

6.2? [T. LeM. Carter]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY; DREDGING OFF CORNWALL ISLAND
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 23)

20. The Minister of Transport said the U.S. Secretary of the Army was coming to Ottawa with his advisers, on May 29th, to discuss with him and Canadian officials the question of dredging off Cornwall Island. The Canadian position on this matter had been that the compensating works in the north channel required under the Boundary Waters Treaty should take the form of excavations suitable for deep water navigation, and that Canada would be prepared to pay 50 per cent of the total cost, provided one-half of the excavations be done by Canadians and the net contribution of the federal government be charged to seaway tolls.

It was believed that the Canadian offer would not be acceptable to the U.S. government, mainly because the U.S. Seaway Development Corporation was short of funds and did not want to embarrass the administration by asking Congress for more money before a presidential election. Although, it was difficult to predict the exact position that Mr. Brucker would take at the forthcoming meetings, he would probably contend that there was no necessity at this time to provide for 27-foot navigation in the north channel; that, if such provision were made, the additional cost involved should not be charged to seaway tolls; and that the U.S. government could not agree to any proposal which required the Seaway Development Corporation to spend more than $4 to $5 million on dredging off Cornwall Island. The U.S. corporation also contended that the power entities should pay the whole cost of the dredging which was worth that much to them in increased head.

In order not to delay the works unduly, it was necessary to reconcile these divergent views and to decide whether or not the Canadian government would be prepared to go beyond its previous offer. He recommended, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs,

(a) that Canada undertake to pay the entire cost of dredging in Canadian territory, which was estimated at two-thirds of the total cost, provided that Ontario Hydro would pay one-half of the estimated benefits accruing to the power entities and that the dredging in Canada would be done by Canadian construction agencies; and,

(b) that, if U.S. representatives could not accept at this moment charging to seaway tolls of the additional cost of providing for 27-foot navigation in the north channel, Canada should be prepared to postpone discussion of this problem as being premature at this time.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 23, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 118-56†).

21. During the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The Canadian government had agreed to build a joint seaway and should not be too rigid on the provision for 27-foot navigation in the north channel because it was not needed immediately. On the other hand, if current negotiations did not lead to a firm agreement on this question, the U.S. government might refuse permission to Canada to proceed with these works in the future. Moreover, the only other alternative at present consisted in digging a pointless hole in the north channel to restore the level and the flow of water. This was clearly undesirable, because the cost of providing for 27-foot navigation at a future date would be much higher than the additional $5 million which was now required.

(b) The power entities had estimated the value of the benefits they would derive from the excavations at approximately $9 million. They would undoubtedly be prepared to pay $10 million. However, the U.S. government had expressed the opinion that the benefits to power could be valued at a much higher figure. The Seaway Development Corporation and the New York Power Authority held divergent views on this question, and Canada should not take part in the discussion between these two U.S. agencies, which had become a public issue and had an obvious domestic political background.

(c) The Canadian offer to contribute 50 per cent of the total cost had apparently been based on the assumption that approximately one-half of the excavations were to be made in Canadian territory, while it appeared now that two-thirds of the dredging would be on the Canadian side. Moreover, it was felt that the allocation of the cost between the United States and Canada was not too important because the contribution of the two seaway entities would be charged to seaway tolls, except, possibly, the additional $5 million required to provide now for 27-foot navigation in the north channel.

(d) The Canadian proposal to share the cost equally with the U.S. appeared generous when considered in the light of the provisions of the 1909 treaty. According to the terms of that treaty, the U.S. government should assume the cost of dredging in the south channel which was estimated at $17 million, and of the works necessary to maintain the flow and levels in the north channel, which had been figured at approximately $4 million. If Canada now offered to pay two-thirds of $17 million, mainly because the Seaway Development Corporation was short of funds and did not want to go back to Congress before the next election, the government could be made to appear in a weak position. Even if the Canadian contribution were to be charged to seaway tolls, the proposal would mean in effect that Canada was making a loan to a U.S. agency.

(e) If Canada were not prepared at this stage to offer to pay two thirds of the cost, the works would probably be delayed for a year. Such a delay was not in the best interests of Canada. However, the Canadian government could not be asked to prevent delays at all cost, especially when the U.S. stood to lose more from delays than Canada.

22. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Transport on dredging off Cornwall Island and agreed that Canadian representatives be authorized to discuss new cost-sharing formulae at the forthcoming meeting with U.S. officials, provided that no commitments be undertaken on behalf of the Canadian government beyond the proposal to pay 50 per cent of the total cost of dredging, including the expenditures involved in providing for 27-foot navigation in the north channel.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 31, 1956

CORNWALL ISLAND DREDGING: MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS

As you know, ministerial discussions were held here on May 29 between representatives of Canada and the United States regarding the question of responsibility for dredging in the St. Lawrence River north and south of Cornwall Island. Mr. Marler and Mr. W.M. Brucker, Secretary of the Army, were the principal representatives.

2. The two main issues in this matter are the form the compensatory dredging in the north channel is to take and the division of the costs of the total amount of dredging between the two seaway and two power entities.

3. The Canadian Government's position on the north channel, which was set forth strongly by Mr. Marler, is that the dredging which must be done in the north channel to compensate for the navigation dredging in the south channel should be in a form suitable for deep water navigation. In his exposition of this attitude, Mr. Marler used three arguments. He stressed the Government's reluctance to spend or contribute to the spending of the estimated $6 million on compensatory dredging in the form of what he called "a perfectly useless hole", when for some $10 million it could be done in a way which would allow for 27-foot navigation if and when the traffic warrants duplicate lock and canal facilities at Barnhart. In addition, he suggested it would be difficult for him to explain to the electors and the manufacturers of Cornwall why the Government chose not to bring 27-foot navigation to that city at this time; the point is that, even without duplicate locks, 27-foot ships ought to be able to come to Cornwall. The Government's primary reason for taking a strong line, which was mentioned but not given prominence by Mr. Marler, is that it does not want a Canadian Government of the future to be prevented from realizing an "all-Canadian seaway" by leaving this essential link in the project dependent on the approval of the United States Government of the day.

4. Although Governor Brucker and the United States delegation listened attentively to Mr. Marler, they were not convinced. Their opposition to the 27-foot north channel appeared to remain firm. Mr. Yingling of the State Department put the United States case succinctly in stating that the Canadian Government was asking the United States now to give up its right under the Boundary Waters Treaty to approve or disapprove projected Canadian works which would affect the level and flow of boundary waters. It was made clear at the meeting that although Canada was obliged to consult the United States before constructing a Canadian canal and locks at Barnhart, only the 27-foot dredging north of Cornwall Island required the consent of the United States (or of the I.J.C.). Mr. Brucker argued that the 27-foot excavation need not be done now and attempted to assuage what he called Canadian fears about the attitude of a future United States Government, and said that the Canadian insistence on the 27-foot north channel was causing real concern to officials in Washington.

5. From the May 29 meeting, therefore, it appears that the United States Government is unwilling to agree at present to a 27-foot navigation channel north of Cornwall Island; Mr. Brucker said that he would take the question back to Washington. There is a possibility that a more generous offer from Canada on the financial side (as discussed in the next paragraph) will persuade the United States authorities to alter their present position, but this is doubtful. Rather than agree to the 27-foot north channel, the United States may be willing to accept a postponement of the target dates for the seaway and power projects, with the idea that the delay could be blamed on Canada.

6. On the question of division of costs, the meeting reached no conclusions. On the basis of various calculations presented by both sides, it appeared that with a larger-than-heretofore-contemplated contribution from the power entities, and a more generous offer by the Canadian Government, a settlement could be reached. The United States authorities have moved from their extreme claim that the power entities should pay for all the dredging, and now would be satisfied if they (i.e. power) contributed about $14 million jointly. As you will remember, the power entities have offered $8.5 to $9.5 million. It was left to the U.S. Seaway Corporation in the first instance to approach the New York State Power Authority in an attempt to obtain the larger amount from Power. Subsequent discussions on this question will include the Seaway Authority and Ontario Hydro. It is anticipated that when the power contribution is agreed, the negotiations regarding division of the remainder will be resumed through diplomatic channels.

7. I think that the Canadian Government may, if it is to stand firm on the 27-foot north channel, have to accept the possibility that agreement will not be reached in the near future and that as a result the whole St. Lawrence project may be delayed. Although the economic and political arguments adduced by Mr. Marler are sound, there is no doubt that some of the blame for the delay will fall on the Canadian Government, especially in the eyes of the United States public. This can probably be ameliorated somewhat by an active program of explanation to the public, but it remains an important factor in considering the problem. In view of our experience with the United States on the St. Lawrence project, I continue to believe that it is in the Canadian national interest to insist that we should dredge the 27-foot north channel now, when our bargaining position is strong, and I recommend that you continue to support this in Cabinet.[116]

[116] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
We should stand firm on this L.B. P[earson]

8. Presumably Mr. Marler will soon hear from Mr. Brucker as to whether the United States will withdraw (and on what conditions) its opposition to Canada's plan to dredge now a 27-foot channel north of Cornwall Island.

Extract from memorandum from Chairman, Interdepartmental Committee on St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project, to Cabinet Committee on St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 146-56 Ottawa, July 9, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

RELOCATION OF THE ROOSEVELT BRIDGE — NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD

Alternative No. 1 (authorized by present legislation)

In accordance with the Cabinet's decision of September 21, 1955[117] it was agreed between the Canadian and United States Governments that the two seaway entities should participate in the construction and share the costs of a new low-level combination highway and railway bridge at Pollys Gut between the western end of Cornwall Island and the United States mainland (marked in red on the attached plan†).[118] The railroad, highway, customs and other related facilities on Cornwall Island between this new span and the existing one which joins the northern end of the Island and the City of Cornwall were to be relocated by the Canadian Seaway entity alone. The United States Seaway Development Corporation undertook to provide uninterrupted highway facilities between the Pollys Gut Bridge and St. Regis (a Canadian Indian district on the south shore of the St. Lawrence that is entirely surrounded by United States territory) via twin bridge facilities at the Grass River Lock and the bridges over the Grass and the Raquette Rivers. Parliament at this session passed the necessary amendment to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to authorize Canadian participation in the new Pollys Gut Bridge.

Side issues were the taking over of the interest of the Cornwall International Bridge Company Limited which operates a toll system and maintains a roadway over and between the two existing spans of the Roosevelt Bridge, (marked in blue on the attached plan) the eventual construction of a high-level highway bridge over the north channel between the City of Cornwall and Cornwall Island, and the operation by the Seaway Authority of a toll system on the highway bridges. Authority for the carrying out of these projects by the Seaway Authority was also granted in the amendment to the Act.

This arrangement is physically very complicated, as can be seen from the attached plan, and is comparatively costly. In any case the New York Central, almost certainly supported by the U.S. Seaway Development Corporation, would now strongly object to it because of the new situation regarding the Reynolds Aluminum Company that is referred to in Alternative No. 3.

Alternative No. 2 (authorized by present legislation)

The foregoing arrangements had been made in the belief that the New York Central did not wish to abandon its Ottawa-Helena line. However, in subsequent negotiations the railroad proposed to abandon the line in return for the payment to it of 3.9 million. This would have resulted in some saving, in that the design of the Pollys Gut Bridge could have been modified and the relocation of the railroad facilities in the Cornwall Island area eliminated. It would also have provided an opportunity for the Federal District Commission to purchase the site of the Ottawa terminus of the railroad, as it must acquire land in this area in any case to enable it to carry out its future plans. It was considered that the road-bed of the line between Ottawa and Cornwall would provide a route for a highway, the provision of which would make it easier for the public and the Board of Transport Commissioners to accept abandonment of the line.

On May 3, 1956 the Cabinet agreed that the Vice-President of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the Chairman of the Federal District Commission be authorized to approach the Ontario Government to see if it were interested in the construction of a highway over the right-of-way and, if so, what amount it was prepared to pay for the right-of-way. The Ontario Government was approached as agreed, but is reported not to be interested in constructing a highway over this route. It was believed that under the circumstances the New York Central would not be able to obtain permission to abandon the line. In view of all this, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority had, within the last few weeks, arrived at the conclusion that it would be necessary to provide, as originally planned, a combined railway and highway bridge at Pollys Gut, together with the other railroad and highway facilities in the Cornwall Island area.

Alternative No. 3 (authorized by present legislation)

A new situation has now arisen that has led the U.S. Seaway Development Corporation to come forward with a further proposal. The Reynolds Aluminum Company is reported to be interested in purchasing, as a site for a large industrial plant, 2,000 acres of land in the vicinity of the proposed relocated highway and rail line on the United States south shore of the St. Lawrence River to the east of the Grass River Lock. The New York Central has already optioned some of the land required and could option the remainder. The Railroad Company expects to gain some $5 million a year in additional revenue if this industry in the vicinity of Rooseveltown, New York, were established. The Company objects to having the railway and highway pass through the site of its plant, as they would if Alternative No. 1 were adopted. Accordingly, the New York Central now proposes to abandon its line between Cornwall and Helena, and to service the Reynolds industry by a spur line connected to one of its other lines in the area. The railway company has mentioned 2.3 million as the price it would wish to receive from the seaway entities for the abandonment. Permission of the Board of Transport Commissioners and of the appropriate corresponding U.S. agency would be required. To solve the highway situation the Seaway Development Corporation is proposing to shift the roadway in a westerly and thence a southerly direction (marked in green on the attached plan). This, however, would revive the problem of the St. Regis Indians and indeed, of all traffic coming from the east through the United States to Cornwall. The Indians going from St. Regis to Cornwall would have to travel an additional six miles. Many of the difficulties in deciding on a plan of relocation in the beginning had arisen because of the desire to cause the Indians as little inconvenience as possible.

Alternative No. 4 (requires new legislation)

If the railway line between Cornwall and Helena were to be abandoned a fourth alternative would be possible. The Pollys Gut Bridge could be abandoned completely and a high level highway bridge built across the south channel of the St. Lawrence River approximately at the site of the present south shore low-level bridge that has to be removed.

The high level highway bridge scheme is much to be preferred over the other schemes. It is far more direct and follows the present north-south international highway route at Cornwall. Preliminary estimates have shown it to be cheaper than other proposals (8.5 million or less versus at least 9 million). In addition, this proposal answers the Aluminum Company's problem and is best for the Indians and other traffic coming from the east by the south shore to Cornwall.

This alternative would, however, require a further amendment to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act at the present session of Parliament, as work should be commenced during the present construction season. The amendment to the Act already passed at the present session, that authorized the Authority to participate in the Pollys Gut Bridge, was drafted in a restrictive manner because the bridge was, at that time, being planned as a low level highway and railway bridge and, as such, the only possible location for it was across Pollys Gut. Also, it was considered that the bill would be more acceptable to Parliament if it referred to a specific bridge in a given location.

Recommendation

It is therefore recommended:

1. that alternative No. 4 be adopted and that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority be authorized to inform the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation that it would be agreeable to joining with the Corporation in financing the costs of the abandonment of the railway facilities between Cornwall and Helena bridge across the south channel between Cornwall Island and the U.S. mainland; and

2. that approval be granted for the introduction at the present session of Parliament of an appropriate amendment to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to empower the Seaway Authority to participate in the construction of the high level bridge.[119]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 20, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

You will recall the discussions which have been going on between the interested authorities in the Canadian and U.S. Governments concerning the Canadian request for our agreement to the dredging of the channel north of Barnhart Island to a depth of 27 feet. This matter was one of the subjects of the discussions held in Ottawa on May 29.

Being aware of the Canadian desire to secure our approval of this dredging and in light of our common interest in avoiding delay in the completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway project, our Departments concerned in Washington have been giving intensive and urgent consideration to finding a solution. I will not bother you with a recitation of our problems and difficulties with which you are familiar.

We believe now, however, that we have found a way out which is embodied in the enclosed copies of a suggested exchange of notes between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States. I am submitting these to you informally and I would greatly appreciate having the opportunity of discussing these draft notes with you as early next week as would be convenient for you. I hope that you will agree that this meets your problems as well as ours.[120]

Sincerely yours,
LIVINGSTON T. MERCHANT

in connection with this development of the St. Lawrence River. The excavations in question will be as follows:

a. South channel enlargements between Miles 107.5 and 109.7

b. Excavations in the south channel from Mile 109.7 downstream to the International Boundary near St. Regis.

c. Compensatory excavations in the north channel for the purpose of providing for a natural distribution of flow between the north and south channels.

The Canadian Government proposes that the division of responsibility for these excavations shall be arranged between the Power and Seaway entities. It is recognized that the Seaway entities are responsible only for works, or features thereof, which are solely for navigation in the Seaway now under construction and that the ensuing costs are chargeable to the toll base of that seaway. The division of responsibility between the two Seaway entities shall conform with the International Boundary line as closely as is practicable.

The Canadian Government recognizes that a duplication of Seaway facilities will not be desirable or economically justified until required by the pressure of increased shipping traffic on the St. Lawrence River facilities as well as on those connecting Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. The Canadian Government therefore proposes that it will not duplicate any part of the St. Lawrence Seaway project in the international rapids section by the construction of additional facilities until such time as the two Governments agree that traffic conditions justify such additional facilities. This shall not exclude any local river and harbor developments related to or connected with the Seaway which may be undertaken provided that such developments will not delay the construction of the Seaway and, if affected by the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, are authorized or agreed to pursuant to the procedures established by that Treaty. The cost of such developments shall not be chargeable to the Seaway toll base.

Simultaneously with the excavation in the North Cornwall Channel required to compensate for the South Channel excavations and enlargements in the maintenance of natural flow distribution, the Canadian Government intends to develop for its own account a local river and harbor improvement program in the North Cornwall Channel. This work is to be so planned and executed that it will not create additional expense or substantial problems with respect to the construction and operation of either the power works in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River or the contemplated 27 foot Seaway channel south of Cornwall Island.

The St. Lawrence River Joint Board of Engineers shall perform the duties specified in clause (g) of the Order of Approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, and in the exchange of notes of November 12, 1953 between the two Governments.[122] The Board shall approve the plans and specifications for compensatory excavations and shall also determine the expense of the minimum compensatory excavations which are required in the north channel in conjunction with the construction of a navigation channel south of Cornwall Island.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 156-56 Ottawa, July 19, 1956

LEGAL REDRESS FOR DAMAGES RESULTING FROM ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT

General Statement

The construction of the St. Lawrence Power Project in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River is being done under the international authority of the International Joint Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952. On July 2, 1956, a Supplementary Order amending the Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, was issued which makes certain changes found necessary as a result of further study in regard to the regulation of the levels of and outflow from Lake Ontario.

2. On February 9, 1956, which was during the period when this Supplementary Order was under consideration, an Aide-Mémoire (relevant portion of text attached as Annex A†) was delivered by the United States State Department to the Canadian Embassy in Washington. It proposed that there be included in the Supplementary Order a provision which would authorize the Commission to undertake a new function; that is, itself to investigate claims for damages alleged to have resulted from anything done in pursuance to the order, and to determine the cause of such alleged damages. The Aide-Mémoire also proposed that such findings should thereafter be made available for use as evidence to any party interested in any dispute arising out of such alleged damage.

Question Requiring Cabinet Decision

3. The question requiring Cabinet decision is what response should be made to the Aide-Mémoire. An interim acknowledgement† was sent in February.

Nature of Study which has been made into the Question

4. The approval of the International Joint Commission expressed in its Order of October 29, 1952, was made subject to certain conditions. The only one of these conditions with which this memorandum is concerned is Condition (a). It provides as follows:

"All interests on either side of the International Boundary which are injured by reason of the construction, maintenance and operation of the works shall be given suitable and adequate protection and indemnity in accordance with the laws in Canada or the Constitution and laws in the United States, respectively, and in accordance with the requirements of Article VIII of the Boundary Waters Treaty."

5. In connection with this condition, the Commission noted in its Order that it finds:

"that suitable and adequate provision is made by the laws in Canada and by the Constitution and laws in the United States for the protection and indemnity of all interests on either side of the international boundary which may be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance and operation of the works."

6. Since the adoption of the International Joint Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, doubts have been expressed from both Canadian and United States sources as to whether adequate protection had been afforded under the laws of Canada and the United States to any interest on either side of the International Boundary which is injured as a result of the operation of the St. Lawrence Power Project. (The damage which some people are worrying about is damage after construction is completed and when the power project is in operation).

7. The most significant development in this connection was the State Department's Aide-Mémoire of February 9, 1956.

8. As a direct result of this Aide-Mémoire, a meeting was held between officials of the Canadian Government and the United States Department of State on March 26, 1956, in Ottawa. At this meeting, there was a frank exploratory exchange of views at the working level, concerning the proposals contained in the Aide-Mémoire.

9. The State Department representative at the meeting indicated that one of the reasons for presenting the Aide-Mémoire was that a private claimant wishing to prove that he had suffered damage as a result of the operation of the St. Lawrence Power Project would be placed in an unfair position. To prove such damage in a court, such a claimant might have to go to the expense of assembling together highly technical data at great financial cost to himself which might be beyond the limits of his own financial resources. The International Joint Commission was in an excellent position to secure data of this kind and what the proposal in the Aide-Mémoire was designed to do was to make the Commission available to the private claimant for this purpose. The State Department Representative further indicated that the Lake Ontario landowners had, through their representatives in Congress, put considerable pressure on the State Department to go very much further than the proposal contained in the Aide-Mémoire.

10. The Department of External Affairs representative at the meeting suggested that the State Department could tell the landowners that, if they should suffer damage, they could have their damage claims heard in the courts and, that if any extraordinary situation should arise in the future which might require government intervention, this problem could be met at that time. There was no point in trying to anticipate these problems before they actually arose, particularly as the fears of the landowners in this regard might be groundless.

11. The External Affairs representative indicated that the Canadian authorities would give earnest consideration to the State Department's Aide-Mémoire, having in mind that the proposals contained in it had the official support of the United States Administration. He also suggested that officials of each Government should re-examine their laws to see if they were adequate. It was open to each Government to endeavour to change them if they were found not to be satisfactory.

12. Following the conclusion of the meeting, consultations took place between officials of the Department of External Affairs and of the Department of Justice, and between these officials and officials of the Ontario Government and Ontario Hydro, with a view to answering the following questions:

(1) Does the International Joint Commission have the authority to amend its Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, in the manner proposed in the State Department's Aide-Mémoire?

(2) If the International Joint Commission does have such authority, how would such a proposal be regarded under the laws of Canada?

(3) Has suitable and adequate provision been made in so far as is possible under the laws of Canada for the protection and indemnity of all interests on either side of the International Boundary which may be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance and operation of the St. Lawrence Power Project?

13. A meeting was held between Mr. Varcoe, Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Magone, Deputy Attorney-General of Ontario, and Mr. McDonald, counsel for the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, in Toronto, on May 4, 1956, to discuss these three questions. A representative from the Department of External Affairs also attended this meeting.

14. Following this meeting, Mr. Varcoe advised the Department of External Affairs in a letter dated May 16, 1956 (copy is attached as Annex B† to this memorandum) in part as follows:

"It is ... my view that the International Joint Commission does not have the authority to amend the Order of Approval (i.e., International Joint Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952) in accordance with proposal of the American State Department as set out in the Aide-Mémoire of February 9, 1956, and that the inclusion of such a provision in the Order of Approval would be devoid of legal significance in so far as the Canadian courts are concerned.

"It follows from what I have said that the Canadian courts would not feel themselves bound by any such provision unless the provision were implemented by appropriate legislation and a statute of the Legislature of Ontario would, undoubtedly, be required. I should also say that it is also my view that the International Joint Commission is not competent to determine any question which might arise in litigation before the courts in a manner which would be binding on the courts having jurisdiction to decide it."

15. As a result of the study which has been made in respect to the third question, it is now the view of the Departments of Justice and External Affairs that, while events may prove that there are weaknesses in the remedies available under Canadian law to persons suffering damages as a result of any act or omission by any Canadian authority relating to the maintenance or operation of the St. Lawrence Power Project, there is, nevertheless, no reasonable ground for doubting the soundness, from the standpoint of Canadian law, of the finding in the Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, regarding the adequacy of Canadian and United States laws concerning legal redress as set out in paragraph 5 of this memorandum.

Recommendation

16. I recommend, therefore, with the concurrence of the Minister of Justice, that a reply along the following lines be made to the United States Aide-Mémoire of February 9, 1956:

The Canadian Government would not favour the proposal contained in the Aide-Mémoire for the following reasons:

(a) Insofar as the laws of Canada are concerned, the necessity does not arise for investing the International Joint Commission with the judicial function proposed in the Aide-Mémoire because the Canadian Government has no reason at this time to doubt the soundness of the finding contained in the Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, regarding the adequacy of these laws to provide appropriate legal redress.

(b) The proposal implies that the International Joint Commission has power to amend Canadian law and to establish itself as part of the judicial machinery of Canada. This the Commission clearly has no authority to do.

(c) The proposal would require the International Joint Commission to assume a new function of a judicial nature, which the Commission as presently constituted is not equipped to undertake. Any attempt to invest the Commission with a judicial function not contemplated by the Boundary Waters Treaty might seriously prejudice its all-important role of dealing with boundary water problems from a broad international policy standpoint.[123]

CORNWALL ISLAND DREDGING

Mr. Merchant's letter of July 20 and the draft exchange of notes which was attached to it have been discussed with the officials of the departments concerned. The reaction of the officials in other departments is similar to those I expressed in my memorandum of July 23,† of which I attach a copy for reference. The general feeling is that the draft which Mr. Merchant sent you represents practically no concession to the Canadian point of view, either in substance or in drafting. As the United States draft shows very little willingness to meet us halfway, it is the recommendation of the officials concerned that you should send back to Mr. Merchant a counter-draft which is phrased in moderate terms but which similarly makes no concession of consequence in the Canadian position. It was particularly the view of the different officials that we should make no concession on the question as to whether or not the costs of the dredging in the north channel additional to that required for compensation should be charged to tolls, or on the question as to the role of the St. Lawrence Joint Board of Engineers. (The United States claims that the Board has authority to approve dredging in the area and we maintain it has no jurisdiction.) Our feeling in the Department was that we might show some willingness to concede on these points, but other officials maintained that we can make concessions later on if the United States authorities show any willingness to give way on our main point, namely, the 27-foot excavations in the north channel.

2. At the same time, it was recommended that in your reply you should set out our views on the 27-foot navigation in the north channel somewhat more clearly than has been set out in writing before, although these views have been expressed in the recent discussions.

3. A copy of the attached letter and draft exchange of notes has been sent to Mr. Baldwin, Deputy Minister of Transport, with the request that he show it to Mr. Marler, as you will presumably want to seek Mr. Marler's concurrence in this text before despatching it.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, August 2, 1956

Dear Livie [Merchant],

I wish to acknowledge your letter of July 20 regarding the discussions which have been proceeding between representatives of the Canadian and the United States Governments on the question of dredging north and south of Cornwall Island. May I say in the first instance that I was disappointed that the suggested exchange of notes did not go very far to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government expressed in previous correspondence and discussions. I attach for your consideration a much shorter draft exchange of notes which has been prepared with the idea that it may be easier to reach agreement if we limit the text to the essential points.

As you know, the chief concern of the Canadian Government in this matter is to ensure that the excavations necessary for 27-foot navigation in the north Cornwall channel shall be done now concurrently with the dredging in the south channel. The reasons for this attitude were set out by my colleague, Mr. Marler, at the meeting with United States representatives on May 29. As the excavations in the south channel would, in any event, require compensatory excavations in the north channel, our view is that the considerable sum required for these compensatory excavations should be spent in such a manner as to protect effectively future 27-foot navigation in the north channel. We desire that provision be made for deep-draft ships using the new seaway to dock at Cornwall. I also understand that excavations for 27-foot navigation in both the north and south channels require, under Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty, the approval of the International Joint Commission or a special agreement between our two governments because of the disturbances of the natural level or flow of boundary waters. We consider it best to settle the matter of north channel excavations between the two governments now, when the natural level and flow of the boundary waters in these channels are being disturbed.

Moreover, if excavations for 27-foot navigation in the north channel are undertaken now concurrently with the work in the south channel, this would confirm that Canada enjoys the same freedom of action in the matter of duplication of navigation works in the International Rapids Section, subject to the same obligation to consult, which the United States enjoys. The Canadian Government attaches great importance to this freedom of action for the eventual construction of navigation facilities on the Canadian side, and for this reason the proposed undertaking not to duplicate navigation facilities in the International Rapids Section without United States agreement, which is set out in the draft note attached to your letter, is not acceptable. As we have indicated a number of times, and as Mr. Marler said on May 29, the Canadian Government has no present intention to build a canal and locks on our side at Cornwall.

Regarding the question of division of responsibility and cost for the excavations north and south of Cornwall Island, I understand that, at a recent meeting between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, a tentative arrangement was made for apportioning the work. I also understand that a tentative arrangement has been made with the power entities as to the contribution which they will respectively make towards the cost of this work. I think it essential that a definitive arrangement between the four seaway and power entities on the subject be concluded either before or concurrently with the exchange of notes. The section of the attached draft dealing with this subject has been drawn up accordingly.

Regarding the inclusion in the toll-base of the cost of north channel excavations other than compensatory ones, I regret that it is not possible for us to concur in your draft. We are unwilling to undertake now that these costs will not be charged to tolls. This does not mean, however, that they definitely will be so charged; but rather that when the various questions regarding the toll-base are reviewed in one or two years' time, the Canadian Government will decide whether this item will be included or held over for later inclusion if and when the canal and locks are built on the Canadian side at Cornwall. Meanwhile, the representations of the United States Government on this point will be given serious consideration.

An additional sentence has been added on customs and immigration procedures and I assume that this would be satisfactory.

I should be glad to discuss the attached draft exchange of notes with you.

SUGGESTED TEXT OF CANADIAN NOTE

I have the honour to refer to the exchange of notes of August 17, 1954 and the exchange of letters of February 21-22, 1955, concerning the St. Lawrence Seaway project which is now being constructed by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, and also to more recent conversations concerning excavations which are to be carried out in the channels north and south of Cornwall Island.

2. The following is my understanding of the agreement which has been reached in the recent discussions:

(a) Arrangements have been made between the Seaway and Power entities regarding division of responsibility for the following excavations:

(1) South channel enlargements between miles 107.5 and 110;

(2) Excavations in the south channel from mile 110 downstream to the International Boundary near St. Regis;

(3) Compensatory excavations in the north channel for the purpose of providing for a natural distribution of flow between the north and south channels.

In conjunction with these excavations it is understood that the United States Government will build training dykes at the entrance to the Grass River lock, and that the Canadian Government will undertake improvements in the north channel which will provide deep water access for the City of Cornwall.

(b) It is agreed that the plans and specifications for the works described in the preceding paragraph will be prepared by the Corporation and the Authority respectively in accordance with the distribution of work which has been arranged.

(c) Each government reaffirms the undertaking given in the notes and letters under reference not to duplicate on its territory, without first consulting the other, the 27-foot navigation works at Iroquois or Barnhart Island now under construction by the Authority and the Corporation respectively.

(d) Appropriate reciprocal customs and immigration arrangements will be made as required.

3. I should be glad to know if you concur in this understanding of the agreement which has been reached.

Note du ministre des Transports pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Minister of Transport to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 185-56 [Ottawa], October 2, 1956

CORNWALL ISLAND DREDGING

Since this question was last discussed in Cabinet on May 23, there have been several exchanges of views with representatives of the United States. I have met twice with Mr. Brucker, the United States Secretary of the Army, and there has been an exchange of correspondence between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the United States Ambassador in Ottawa. Thus far the United States authorities have not been able to agree to our plans for 27-foot excavations in the channel north of Cornwall Island. Indeed, at my September 13 meeting with Mr. Brucker, the United States attitude on this point appeared more rigid than before.

2. At that meeting the Secretary of the Army informed me of a new legal opinion which he had obtained from the United States Attorney General. The substance of this opinion is that the United States has full legal right, without further consent from Canada, to dredge a navigation channel south of Cornwall Island to provide access to the Grass River lock. The reasoning is that when Canada agreed in 1954 that the United States should build this lock, it also approved implicitly any works necessary to bring the lock into operation. Following from this opinion, Mr. Brucker argued that the United States is entitled to arrange for appropriate compensatory works in the north channel, without unreasonable conditions with respect to cost, location or character being interposed by Canada. Furthermore, the Attorney General considered that the United States Government cannot by executive act agree to Canada's plans for dredging a 27-foot channel north of Cornwall Island. This statement is based on an interpretation of the Wiley-Dondero Act of 1954.

3. While there is no point in embarking on a legal discussion in reply to the new United States legal opinion, we cannot agree that there is no limitation on the United States right to dredge in the south channel. In the first place, part of this work is in Canadian territory, and Canadian consent is clearly necessary before it can be undertaken. Secondly, under the Boundary Waters Treaty, the United States may not make excavations which materially affect the levels and flows on the Canadian side, except with the approval of the International Joint Commission, or in accordance with an inter-governmental agreement. It follows that the United States must make acceptable arrangements for north channel excavations, or other compensatory works, as otherwise the excavations in the south channel would materially affect the levels and flows on the Canadian side.

4. Prior to the exposition of this new legal opinion, the United States Government made the suggestion that if Canada were to engage not to construct a canal and locks on the Canadian side at Cornwall without United States consent, the United States approval for the 27-foot north channel excavations would be forthcoming now, although in this case the approval would be contingent on Canada not including the costs of the additional north channel works in the toll base. It appeared from this suggestion that Mr. Brucker was attempting to secure now a Canadian commitment which he failed to obtain in the 1954 negotiations, i.e., an arrangement whereby Canada could not complete the all-Canadian seaway without obtaining explicit United States consent. There is no more reason to agree now to this proposal than there was in 1954.

5. It is becoming clear, as a result of these discussions, that the United States Government is unwilling to conclude a new formal agreement which would include provision for 27-foot excavations in the north channel. We have been concerned, therefore, to ascertain the extent to which existing agreements may be interpreted to include approval for these excavations. By the 1952 exchange of notes, the Canadian Government "with parliamentary approval committed itself to provide and maintain whatever additional works may be required to allow uninterrupted 27-foot navigation between Lake Erie and the port of Montreal". In its reply, the United States Government expressed approval of these arrangements. By the 1954 exchange of notes, Canada was relieved of its obligation "to provide forthwith the navigation works in the general vicinity of Barnhart Island on Canadian territory". At the same time, the Government expressed its intention to complete 27-foot navigation works on the Canadian side "if and when it considers that parallel facilities are required to accommodate existing or potential traffic", after consultation with the United States Government. The approval given in the 1952 agreement to Canadian navigation works in this area is thus still valid, subject to the consultation requirement.

6. Although the existing agreements give approval for the remaining navigation works necessary for an all-Canadian seaway, there remains the Boundary Waters Treaty limitation on that part of the excavations in the north Cornwall channel which might materially affect levels and flows on the United States side (part of the north channel excavations would have such an effect, and part would not). In the absence of an intergovernmental agreement or approval by the International Joint Commission, Canada is obliged to arrange compensatory dredging or other works to ensure that the levels and flows on the United States side are not materially affected. Canada has thus in this matter the same limitations as the United States has in regard to south channel dredging. The question of 27-foot excavations in the north channel has been under discussion between the two governments since February, 1956, and thus the Canadian obligation to consult the United States before undertaking these works has been discharged.

7. While a new formal agreement which would meet our conditions appears at this time to be most unlikely, it must be borne in mind that on July 18, nearly two months before I last met Mr. Brucker, the two seaway entities made suitable arrangements at a meeting of engineers for apportioning the costs of the dredging, and worked out the broad lines of a package deal. Under the package deal, Canada would do all the dredging in the north channel which is exclusively in Canadian territory and a portion in the south channel, which straddles the international boundary. Under these arrangements the requirements of the Boundary Waters Treaty concerning the levels and flows of the river would be met. An oral understanding might be reached between the two seaway entities that the July 18 arrangements would not be embodied in a formal agreement, but that each seaway entity would carry out its undertaking and pay for the dredging comprised in its share of the package.

8. The financial part of the arrangement involves expenditure by each government of $11.7 million ($17.7 million less $6 million which is one-half of the contribution from the two power entities in respect of the benefits they will receive from the dredging). Although the contributions of the two governments appear to be equal, Canada would pay some $3 million more than she would have paid under the precise terms of the Cabinet decision of February 23, because two new items which total about $6 million and which would otherwise have been paid by the U.S. Seaway Development Corporation, were included in the package and have been added to the United States total.

9. Another new development is of interest. Early in September, the United States Seaway Development Corporation called for tenders, to be opened October 10, for the excavation of the Grass River Lock entrance, a part of the south channel works which would not affect the levels and flows on the Canadian side of the boundary. This dredging was part of the "package" discussed at the engineers' meeting on July 18, and it was the Canadian understanding that no part would be begun until the whole question of Cornwall Island dredging was settled. This new United States action calls the July arrangements into question and should not be allowed to go unnoticed.

10. The undersigned, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, therefore recommends:

(1) That the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority be authorized to proceed with that part of the north channel excavations which would not materially affect levels and flows on the United States side of the boundary, and thus would not require compensatory works;

(2) That, with respect to those excavations in either the north or south channels which would materially affect levels and flows on the opposite side of the boundary and thus would require compensatory works, a further attempt be made to conclude a formal agreement with the United States or an understanding to proceed on the basis of the July 18 engineering arrangements; if neither of these courses proves possible, and if the United States proceeds with south channel excavations which materially affect levels and flows on the Canadian side, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority should concurrently undertake north channel excavations, remaining ready to carry out its part of the engineering arrangements of July 18, 1956;

(3) That approval be given for the financial obligations involved in the engineering arrangements of July 18, 1956.[124]

Memorandum by Minister of Transport

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 11, 1956

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH THE HONOURABLE WILBER M. BRUCKER, SECRETARY OF THE U.S. ARMY, CONCERNING THE PROPOSED CHANNEL DREDGING TO BE DONE AT CORNWALL

I opened the discussion with Mr. Brucker by informing him that at its meeting on Wednesday, October 3rd, the Cabinet had authorized the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to call for tenders for a small section of dredging in the channel north of Cornwall Island (coloured blue on the plan showing the allocation of the dredging work) in the expectation that the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation would more or less simultaneously call for tenders for the work of (a) dredging the entrance to the Grass River Lock, and (b) erecting the training dike at the south end of Polleys Gut. I also told Mr. Brucker that the Cabinet had given the Seaway Authority the necessary authorization to enable it to incur the expenditures for the work which was allocated to it under the agreed allocation of July 18th.

[124] Ces trois recommandations ont été approuvées par le Cabinet le 3 octobre 1956.
These three recommendations were approved by Cabinet on October 3, 1956.

I also informed Mr. Brucker that the Cabinet had authorized me to suggest to him that a formal agreement be made between our two countries to implement the agreed allocation of work of July 18th, but that if for any reason the making of a formal or written agreement presented difficulties, it would be perfectly agreeable to us if, by common consent and without a written agreement, each of the two entities — the Seaway Authority and the Seaway Development Corporation — simply proceeded simultaneously to carry out the work covered by the allocation of July 18th.

This led Mr. Brucker to a brief review of the two points made by the U.S. Attorney General, which were in substance that the United States required no further consent from Canada to carry out the requisite dredging in the south channel in order to provide an entrance to the Grass River Lock and, likewise without Canadian consent, to carry out the compensatory dredging in the north channel.

I told Mr. Brucker that while I fully understood the U.S. position, that in our view the 1952, 1954 and 1955 notes and letters did not override the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty and that it was our view that (a) if Canada, pursuant to the 1952 notes, had undertaken the building of an all-Canadian seaway, it would have considered that United States consent was requisite to the carrying out in United States territory of any compensatory dredging that might be necessitated by the all-Canadian seaway if it disturbed the distribution or the flow of the river at any point, and (b) that if the United States, pursuant to the 1954 and 1955 notes, carried out dredging in the south channel which would disturb the distribution or the flow of the water, Canadian consent would be required as to the manner and place in which any compensatory dredging in Canadian territory would be carried out.

This, of course, made it perfectly clear that there was a fundamental difference in viewpoint between us but that I hoped that a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the notes would not interfere with our reaching a satisfactory conclusion. I emphasized that I saw no reason for us to pay too much attention to the legal arguments provided that we could come to an understanding as to the carrying out of the work according to our wishes.

I thought it opportune to emphasize to Mr. Brucker that if the U.S. believes that an implicit consent applied to the 1954 note by which the United States obtained Canadian consent to the building of the American locks at Barnhart Island, Canada, whose position for the future had been made perfectly clear in the 1954 notes, had the right to dredge the navigation channel without U.S. consent, though this was not in line with the opinion of the Legal Division of External Affairs, which believed that the consent of the two countries was required and that each needed the consent of the other for the dredging works which it was proposed to carry out around Cornwall Island.

I then came back to the question of the form of an agreement. I suggested to Mr. Brucker that we consider that the requisite consents had already been given and that we should proceed on the basis that when the Seaway Development Corporation called for tenders for the south channel dredging (coloured brown) the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority would immediately after call for tenders on the north and south channel dredging (coloured red).

At this point, Mr. Brucker referred to Paragraph 3 of the Attorney General's opinion which precluded him and the Administration from now making any formal agreement. I told him that we would not attempt to express an opinion as to the interpretation of a U.S.

public law, but that I hoped that the expedient of merely proceeding without a formal written agreement would enable the U.S. Administration to overcome the difficulties which the Attorney General's opinion created. Mr. Brucker said that he would have to give that careful consideration and that he was not free to commit the Administration even orally.

Mr. Brucker referred to the paragraph of Mr. Pearson's letter to Mr. Merchant as to the excess of the cost of the navigation channel over the cost of purely compensatory works and I told Mr. Brucker that if this were the only obstacle to a complete agreement between us I would recommend to the Government that we agree that the extra cost be not included in the toll base, though I pointed out that we would much prefer to deal with all questions concerning the toll base at a later date. In our discussion, however, Mr. Brucker did not seem to attach a great deal of importance to this point, though conceivably it may become an issue before the matter is settled.

Mr. Brucker told me that it would be necessary for him to discuss the matter with higher authority and that he would talk to Mr. Wilson on the subject and that quite possibly it would have to be settled by the President himself. I said that we attached a great deal of importance to the question and that Mr. Howe had expressed his willingness to talk to Mr. Wilson about the matter and that in turn the Prime Minister had said that, if necessary, he would be prepared to take it up with the President himself because of the importance of the issue so far as Canada was concerned.

The meeting concluded with Mr. Brucker promising that he would directly or indirectly communicate with me within the next ten days.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT: LEGAL REDRESS

Today the State Department presented to us an aide mémoire on this subject which is in reply to the aide mémoire† we left with them on August 8/56. The aide mémoire we received today is dated October 26 and it has as an enclosure a revised statement of the USA proposal for inclusion in an amendment to the International Joint Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, a section dealing with legal redress. The texts of the USA aide mémoire and its enclosure are given in our immediately following telegram.

2. In their oral comments the State Department said that they wished to stress that the purpose of their proposal was not, repeat not, to invest the International Joint Commission with functions which it does not already possess. The State Department regard their proposal as an effort to set out clearly in writing the existing responsibilities of the International Joint Commission under the terms of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. They said that the purpose of their proposal was to overcome the adverse "psychological effects" which had been created among property owners because of the absence from the Commission's Order of October 1952 of a clear statement relating to legal redress.

3. We were given to understand by the State Department that Representative Keating's office in all probability has already been informed of the existence of their latest aide mémoire.[125]

ST. LAWRENCE POWER PROJECT: LEGAL REDRESS

Following are texts of aide mémoire and its enclosure: Text begins.

On August 8/56 officers of the Canadian Embassy called at the Department of State and left an aide mémoire of that date setting forth reasons for the conclusion of the Canadian Government that it did not view with favor the proposal for dealing with complaints of shore owners respecting the level of Lake Ontario set forth in the communication of the Department of State of February 9/56.

The views set forth in the aide mémoire have been examined with interest and it is regretted that the intent of the paragraph proposed for inclusion in an amendment to the Commission's Order of Approval of October 29, 1952, seems to have been misunderstood by the Canadian Government, as its interpretation of the language which was proposed would appear to go beyond that contemplated by the USA Government.

With a view to clarifying the intent of the USA, there is enclosed a revised statement of this proposal which it is hoped will remove the grounds for objection. In the event that the enclosed draft is not acceptable to the Canadian Government, it is hoped that language will be suggested which is considered satisfactory from the point of view of the Canadian authorities.

The Canadian Government is, of course, fully aware of the uneasiness and concern which has been expressed by property owners with respect to the arrangements for legal redress which exist in connection with the construction of the St. Lawrence projects. Therefore, it is desired to stress once again the need for finding a means whereby this problem may be resolved as otherwise it is a basis for continuing and increasing difficulty in dealing with further developments in connection with the St. Lawrence projects.

CORNWALL ISLAND DREDGING

On November 7, the United States Embassy delivered a note† to the Department regarding the question of dredging north and south of Cornwall Island. This note indicates that the United States Government recognizes the de facto situation which results from the Canadian decision to dredge a twenty-seven foot channel north of Cornwall Island, but makes the allegation that the Canadian decision is "not in accord with" the exchange of notes of August 17, 1954 and other arrangements on the St. Lawrence projects. It also states that "the United States reserves all its rights to protect its interests in this matter".

2. Consideration has been given in the Interdepartmental Committee on St. Lawrence matters to the reply which might be sent to this note, and a draft note† (copy attached) has been sent to Mr. Marler for approval. If he and his colleagues on the Cabinet St. Lawrence Committee agree on this text, it will be submitted to the Minister, or in his absence to yourself, for signature.

3. The Interdepartmental Committee has also agreed on the text of a press release which would be issued a week after the presentation of our note. It is anticipated that the notes would be released to the press simultaneously in Ottawa and Washington, but with different governmental statements appended. The text of our release is attached in the draft form in which it is now before Mr. Marler for approval.[126]

4. When consideration of these drafts had reached an advanced stage, we received a suggestion from the Ambassador in Washington (Telegram No. 2107,† attached) that the State Department might be asked to withdraw its note and replace it with one drafted in

The draft note was approved by Pearson and the other members of the Cabinet Committee on the St. Lawrence without change. For the exchange of notes and the text of the press release, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 9, No. 2, February 1957, pp. 74-76.

milder language. The sharpness of the U.S. note had elicited a similar reaction from officers of the Department when it was first received, but it was considered unlikely that the U.S. authorities, having come quite a distance in accepting Canadian policy on this question, would be willing to make further concessions as regards language. The Embassy has informed us that the U.S. note was sent after a meeting of the Secretaries of State, Defence, the Army and the Attorney-General. An attempt to get the Americans to revise their note now might call forth an adverse reaction, and even upset the "agreement to disagree" which has been reached. Moreover, officials in Ottawa are not as concerned as the Embassy about the unfortunate consequences of publishing the U.S. note and our reply. Mr. Heeney's suggestion has, however, been submitted to Mr. Marler for consideration, with the comment that the State Department is unlikely to be willing to replace its note, especially some two weeks after it was sent.

UNITED STATES COTTON SUBSIDIES

I attach a draft of a memorandum† to Cabinet on new United States policies on cotton subsidies which are to come into effect on August 1. I understand Mr. Harris, with the concurrence of Mr. Howe and Dr. McCann, intends to circulate this memorandum for a Cabinet discussion of the matter at the special Cabinet meeting on the morning of Friday, July 20, and that all three Ministers have agreed to it in its present form.

2. United States officials have indicated both in Ottawa and in Washington that they consider Canadian anti-dumping duties should not be levied on imports of subsidized United States cotton manufactures. It is considered that the Canadian position should be explained to the State Department, and two Aide Mémoires have been drafted interdepartmentally for presentation in Washington: one indicating certain objections to the new United States policies because of their probable effect on world trading and on common defence objectives; and the other describing our position regarding the application of Canadian anti-dumping duties on imports of subsidized United States cotton manufactures. Copies of these draft Aide Mémoires are attached, and I should be grateful to know whether you agree these should be presented in Washington on Friday afternoon, provided Cabinet approves the Canadian position as stated in the Memorandum.[127]

OK. Cabinet approved of memorandum this afternoon. July 23 [L.B. Pearson]

3. The draft memorandum to Cabinet and the drafts of the two Aide Mémoires have been thoroughly discussed by officials of this Department, the Bank of Canada, and the Departments of Finance, Trade and Commerce and National Revenue. Mr. Couillard from the Embassy in Washington was present at a discussion of these drafts on July 13, and the Canadian position is being recommended by officials in the full understanding that there may be a fairly vigorous reaction on the part of the United States. It was considered that because of the chances of increasing competition from cheaper cotton goods imports from third countries, future developments should be carefully watched and further measures to protect the position of Canadian cotton manufactures might have to be considered.

Projet d'un aide-mémoire

Draft Aide Mémoire

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 16, 1956

THE BROAD ASPECTS OF U.S. COTTON SUBSIDIES

The Canadian Government wishes to refer to the policies which are being adopted by the United States to subsidize exports of raw cotton and exports of cotton textiles. The Canadian Government has given careful study to the information which has become available regarding plans for a two-price system for the disposal of cotton and related measures of subsidization of exported textiles. Concern is felt in Canada about the consequences of these policies from two points of view. First, their effect will be to upset and disorganize world production and trade in raw cotton and in cotton textiles, in direct ratio to the vigour with which the measures are applied. Difficulties will predictably be increased for numerous countries overseas. Strains will therefore be imposed upon various international undertakings and agreements in which the United States, Canada and others are co-partners, not only in the field of trade and finance but in the fields of security and defence as well. The second of these concerns pertains to particular problems which these policies create for the administration of Canadian laws and it is being dealt with in a separate Note (aide-mémoire).

2. The Canadian Government has for some time been sympathetically aware of the accumulation of surplus cotton in the United States, of the problems attendant thereto, and the difficulties which have been encountered in finding solutions to these problems. The Canadians Government is equally aware, however, of the difficult problems of numerous countries, which are producers of cotton or cotton textiles, and which will consider that they are being injured by these policies of surplus disposal and subsidy. The United States Government must also have felt concern on this score. Included amongst these countries, in addition to ones which are well disposed on matters of defence and security, are others which are uncommitted to the objectives which are held in common by the policies of United States, Canada and others in the Western World. While the Canadian Government understands that final decisions have been made in the United States to implement these new policies, it would express the confident hope in the light of all the circumstances that the administration of these policies will be tempered by recognition of the problems of others which are likely to be adversely affected.

3. Referring to the payments which will be made to United States exporters of cotton textiles, the text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade has been carefully examined and reconsideration has also been given to what should properly be understood by the concept of a governmental subsidy. As a result of this examination the Canadian Government concludes that these payments must be regarded as subsidies even though they are referred to as equalization payments. The Canadian Government is concerned, therefore, about the implications of these policies of assistance to exports for the revised provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which were negotiated in 1954-55. The apparent conflict between these new policies and the revised form of Article XVI of the General Agreement gives rise to uncertainties regarding the status of the new articles and the plans of the United States in this connection.

4. While, of course, affected by the measures applicable to exported cotton textiles, Canada is not itself a producer of raw cotton. Nevertheless, the Canadian Government cannot remain indifferent to the consequences for the world overseas of the two-price system for raw cotton. The Canadian Government fully understands and appreciates the motives which have led the United States to consult the interests of other countries and often to take these interests into account in other connections. It hopes that similar considerations will be kept fully in mind in this new context.

Projet d'un aide-mémoire

Draft Aide Mémoire

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 16, 1956

THE IMPACT ON CANADA OF U.S. COTTON SUBSIDIES

In an accompanying aide mémoire the Canadian Government has set forth its general concern regarding the broad aspects of the newly adopted policy of the Government of the United States in selling raw cotton abroad at a subsidized price and instituting a related subsidy on the cotton content of exported manufactures containing cotton. In this aide mémoire the Canadian Government makes special reference to the direct impact of these actions on Canada.

2. The actions which the U.S. Government proposes to take will, as has already been noted, be certain to cause repercussions in the markets for raw cotton and cotton manufactures all around the world. But the nature and extent of these repercussions is quite uncertain: it is not yet known how far or how rapidly the U.S. Administration is expecting to proceed in carrying out the intention of Congress to recapture certain markets for raw cotton; it is not yet known how far and in what ways U.S. exporters of cotton fabrics will make use of the subsidy provisions relating to exports of manufactures; and it is not yet known how the markets all around the world, both in raw cotton and cotton manufactures, will react to these new circumstances. All that can be said with certainty is that a period of unusual stress and difficulty may be anticipated.

3. Canadian manufacturers of cotton textiles, like Canadian manufacturers of other products, are afforded a certain protection by the Canadian tariff. This protection consists of the particular rates of duty provided for particular classes of goods, supplemented by an anti-dumping duty (Section 6 of the Customs Tariff) which comes into effect when, and to the extent that, goods are sold for export to Canada at prices below their fair market value within the exporting country. It will be noted that, in Canadian law, the definition of dumping is in close accord with provisions of the GATT.

4. Under a provision of the Customs Tariff the Government may suspend the anti-dumping provisions of the law. This provision has been used on very few occasions. When it has been used its purpose has been either to mitigate shortages in Canada or to facilitate imports into Canada from countries in balance-of-payments difficulties. Imports of cotton goods from the United States do not fall into either of these categories. Accordingly, any suspension or exception in favour of these goods would constitute a major departure from Canadian practices, well established over many decades, and its suspension under circumstances of great uncertainty in which a Canadian industry is threatened with material injury could not be defended.

5. Canadian manufacturers, in all sorts of lines, rightly regard the anti-dumping duty as an essential element in the tariff protection afforded to them. Most of them are, by American standards or even by European standards, relatively small operators with relatively high costs per unit and continent-wide transportation and selling costs to meet. Canadian tariff rates are, in comparison with those of many countries, moderate if not low, and if imports were permitted to be valued at prices even lower than the prices prevailing for home consumption in much larger markets abroad, Canadian manufacturers would at any time be liable to suffer material injury. Indeed, if the Canadian anti-dumping duty did not exist in its present form, many Canadian tariff rates would have to be a great deal higher than they are at present.

6. The Canadian cotton textile industry is no exception to the general statements made above regarding the position of Canadian manufacturers, indeed it may be taken as a prime example of them. Canadian textile firms are smaller than comparable firms in the U.S.A., their volume of production (especially in so-called "style goods") is much less, their costs per unit are higher, and their sales must be made in a relatively small market scattered across the whole continent. Nevertheless Canadian tariffs on imports of cotton textiles are moderate by any standards, indeed the Canadian industry claims that there is no cotton textile industry anywhere in the world with less protection. The anti-dumping duty is an essential and established element in that protection.

7. The vulnerability of the Canadian cotton textile industry is illustrated by its experience since the war. During that period most Canadian industries have been rapidly expanding and greatly prospering. But the cotton textile industry has failed to expand and prosper. The Canadian consumption of cotton textiles has grown greatly — by about two-thirds of its pre-war level. But virtually the whole of this expanded consumption has been supplied from abroad. Imports from the United States have risen spectacularly. Before the war U.S. imports supplied less than 10% of Canadian consumption; recently they have been supplying nearly 40%. Despite these developments, the Canadian Government has resisted persistent requests that particular tariff rates, which for technical reasons actually give even less protection than before the war, should be raised and that the relevant "escape clause" provisions of the GATT should be invoked.

8. Considering the vulnerability of the Canadian cotton textile industry, considering the established position of the antidumping provisions of the tariff as an essential element in the tariff as a whole, and considering the fact that the proposed U.S. actions are bound to produce a period of unusual stress and difficulty throughout the world in markets for raw cotton and cotton manufactures, it is quite out of the question that the Canadian Government should forthwith suspend or modify the normal application of the anti-dumping duty. Accordingly the Canadian Government has decided that, at this time, no change will be made in the normal application of that duty.

9. At the same time, the Canadian Government has decided that, at this stage and pending clarification of the situation, it should not resort to its extensive powers to apply anti-subsidy duties under Section 6A of the Customs Tariff.

10. The Canadian Government intends to keep the situation under close scrutiny and to consider adaptations in its policy in the light of developing circumstances. If it appears, in the light of experience, that serious inequity is developing, this will be taken into account. Moreover, it is anticipated that textile industries situated overseas, receiving cheaper raw cotton as a result of the U.S. actions, will be able to compete even more effectively than formerly for a share of the North American market. This intensified competition will have to be kept under continuous review.

USA COTTON POLICIES

As mentioned to Stoner this morning, on the telephone, we presented the aide mémoires to Thibodeaux of the State Department, this morning. We had asked to see Prochnow but as he was unable to see us today he suggested that we should pass this message to Thibodeaux.

2. The discussion following the presentation of the notes was most amicable. It was evident that the State Department were disappointed when they found that we were not going to suspend the application of the antidumping duties, but at the same time they did not over emphasize the difficulties that this action by Canada would propose for them.

3. In commenting on the first memorandum, they were quick to reassure us that they were thoroughly in agreement with USA that it was in their own interest that they should administer their raw cotton subsidy plan in such a way as to cause the least possible disturbance to world markets, and particularly to the economy of other cotton producing countries. They have already had discussions with cotton producing countries and have evidently made it plain to them that they do not intend to break world prices but that they are under certain directives from the Congress which they cannot ignore. Thus they reason that the effect of their actions on world cotton prices will depend very much on what other cotton producers do. If other raw cotton producers become panicky and force their cotton onto the world markets in such a way as to make it impossible for the USA to sell cotton, then the USA would have no alternative other than to follow downward in order to ensure that they move enough cotton to give them what might be regarded as a reasonable share of the world's market. They emphasized that the instructions from the Congress give to the Secretary of Agriculture considerable leeway, and that there is no firm target for exports that they must aim at. In other words, the State Department are thoroughly in sympathy with the concern expressed by us in our first memorandum, over the effect of their policies on other countries, and they will do everything possible to avoid starting a price war, or any undue disturbance in the world market.

4. The second point that was made by Thibodeaux was that the USA will not accept the line of argument that is set out in paragraph 3 of our first memorandum, that the payments must be regarded as subsidies. The administration regards these payments as equalization payments and, in a release published today announcing the amount of the subsidy, they are carefully referred to as equalization payments throughout. Reference was made to the mounting volume of imports of textiles into the USA and the increasing difficulty the USA industry is meeting abroad from competition from other countries whose industries have been able to obtain cotton at prices considerably below the USA domestic prices of cotton. They referred to the bill introduced by Senator Smith of Massachusetts, that would have enabled the domestic cotton manufacturers to buy cotton in the domestic market at prices sufficiently low to enable the industry to compete in textile manufactures in the world's markets. Fortunately for all concerned, this bill did not get beyond the hearing stage in the Finance Committee of the Senate, but it is indicative, they pointed out, of the pressures that they are faced with.

5. Nor do the State Department appear to be concerned over their ability to justify their action under Article XVI of the GATT. Their line of argument here is that this is not a subsidy on manufactured products, but a subsidy on the cotton content of manufactured products. They point out that the way in which the subsidy is applied is not based on the finished product but only on the cotton content of that product.

6. They expressed considerable satisfaction at the statement contained in paragraph 9 of our second memorandum concerning our decision not to apply at this time the antisubsidy duties under Section 6(A) of the Customs Tariff.

7. In discussing the effect of the Canadian antidumping duties, they referred to the difficulties that had been created for the domestic mills by the amendment to the Canadian antidumping duties providing for a consideration of price levels going back over six months. They seemed to think that this had created a real hardship for USA exports to Canada, although we did not hesitate to point out that they have no real reason to complain about their level of exports to Canada since the war. They went on to suggest that if at some future time the prices offered to Canada by domestic mills were found to be below the level of prices in the USA over the previous six months, it would be impossible to tell if the reason for the lower prices rested in the subsidy or in some other factors. We simply replied to this remark to the effect that this was an illustration of the kind of uncertainties which made it unrealistic to expect us to lower our guard and to suspend the application of the antidumping duties.

Memorandum from Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 15, 1956

COMPLAINT OF CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LIMITED REGARDING UNITED STATES TAXES

You received this morning the following representatives of this company, D.J. Burchell, Q.C. of Halifax, C.F. Elliott, Q.C. and D.K. MacTavish, Q.C. of Ottawa. Also present was Mr. Benidickson, M.P., Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance.

2. Mr. Burchell handed to you two letters addressed to you — one dated May 11 from the Vice-President of the company and the other dated May 14† from Mr. Burchell. The letter from the Vice-President asks the Canadian Government to protest against the attempt by the United States tax authorities to levy certain taxes against the company, which I shall hereafter refer to as Premium. Mr. Burchell's letter asks you specifically to ask the United States Government for a conference on this matter pursuant to Articles XIII and XVIII of the Double Taxation Convention of 1942 (Treaty Series 1942, No. 2), Premium would like you to take this action almost immediately, in the hope that it would have the result of causing the United States authorities to delay the opening of the trial of their court action against Premium, which is scheduled to start on May 28 in the United States Court of Tax Appeals.

3. From what these gentlemen told you, and from what they told me after you had to leave, I gather that they are not asserting that the United States taxing effort constitutes a breach of the 1942 Convention. They do argue that it is an unfair and unreasonable action against a Canadian company, in view of the history of the transaction which the letters explain. They also argue that, if the United States Government succeeds in enforcing the claim for the proposed taxes on Premium, this will lead to similar unjustifiable proceedings against other Canadian companies, which would or could have a serious effect on Canadian industry especially in the mining field.

4. I understand that the Minister of National Revenue, Dr. McCann, did once intervene at the request of Premium to the extent of asking the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue to postpone the trial of the case in order to allow time for the Department of National Revenue to study their grievance. This was referred to in the House of Commons on February 24, 1956.[128] I gather from what the representatives of Premium said today that subsequently Dr. McCann decided, on the advice of his Deputy Minister, that he would not make any further representation to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I should point out that the Convention itself specifies the Minister of National Revenue and the Commissioner as the "competent authorities" who may ask to confer with each other on problems arising under the Convention. (see paragraph 4 of Protocol).

5. According to Mr. Elliott the United States Secretary of the Treasury has legal authority, even after a court case has been started, to withdraw or compromise a tax claim of this kind. I got the impression that, although Premium would like the Canadian Government to take action immediately in order that the trial on May 28 may be postponed again, Premium would be glad to have Canadian Government intervention even after the trial has started. It is obvious that the trial and possible appeals from it will last a long time.

6. I suggest that you might consult the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the first instance. If you then considered that there is a case to be made for Canadian Government intervention through the diplomatic channel, you might wish to have the matter considered in Cabinet. I suggest Mr. Howe in addition to Dr. McCann because Mr. Howe as Minister of Munitions and Supplies would have known all about the Premium and Steep Rock project during the war. Also, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, he might be in a position to assess the validity of the argument by the representatives of Premium that many other important Canadian companies will be badly hurt if the United States Government succeeds in enforcing the present tax claim against Premium.

7. After you left the meeting Mr. Burchell gave me the annexed copy of the 1943 agreement between Steep Rock and Premium.†

8. Annexed for signature are letters† to Dr. McCann and Mr. Howe.[129]

Vice-President of Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited

Toronto, May 11, 1956

Dear Mr. Pearson,

Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited, a Company incorporated under the laws of the Province of Ontario with Head Office at the City of Toronto, hereby requests that the Canadian government protest against the attempt by the United States taxing authorities to levy taxes against income falsely alleged to have been earned by Premium.

Premium was organized under the laws of Ontario in 1942 for the purpose of assisting in the financing, development and sales of Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited. Its officers and directors were all Canadian citizens. While owned largely by United States citizens, it was required by the Canadian authorities to be organized as a Canadian corporation so that its income would be taxable in Canada, and its transactions subject to Canadian control.

[129] Notes marginales :/Marginal Notes:
Should I send copies to Mr. Benidickson? [M. Wershof]
Yes L.B. P[earson]

On January 15, 1943, Premium entered into a contract with Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited, a Canadian Corporation, whereby Premium agreed among other things to:

1. Guarantee the sale of 10 million tons of iron ore in a ten year period, and not less than 500,000 tons in each year;

2. Provide $1,000,000 of additional cash to Steep Rock if the financing already arranged proved insufficient to complete the development. (This amount was required and Premium furnished it plus additional large sums);

3. Arrange for shipping, collections and similar matters in connection with the sale and delivery of the iron ore.

The contract included a subscription by Premium for 1,437,500 shares of Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited capital stock at a nominal price.

The United States is attempting to levy a tax on the difference between the nominal price and the quoted market price of similar shares. The following history of the transaction will demonstrate the injustice and the illegality of this attempt.

At the time this contract was made, the Second World War was at its height, the visible supply of iron ore was dangerously low, and both the United States and Canadian governments urged all possible speed in the Steep Rock development, and co-operated wholeheartedly with Steep Rock and Premium in the development.

The Canadian government advanced the necessary funds to the Canadian National Railways to provide railroad and dock facilities and a subsidy on the freight rates during the first years of delivery of the ore.

The Ontario government provided the power facilities for the development and operation of the property.

The United States government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation made a loan of $5,000,000 to Steep Rock for the development.

The arrangement covered by this contract was submitted to various departments of our government, including the Department of National Defence, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Finance, the Department of Transport, the Department of Munitions and Supply, and the Department of External Affairs, and the contract itself was specifically approved by the Foreign Exchange Control Board and the Department of National Revenue.

These Departments co-operated to implement performance of the contract and the Department of National Revenue specifically ruled that no taxable income would result from the receipt by Premium of these shares of Steep Rock stock.

This contract between Steep Rock and Premium was submitted to and approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Otis & Co., a United States banking firm, provided $2,250,000 of junior money to Steep Rock and in connection therewith filed this contract with the Securities and Exchange Commission which was open for public inspection and given wide circulation.

Premium undertook to finance and develop the Steep Rock properties after numerous steel and mining companies in both the United States and Canada rejected it as impossible. The U.S. and Canada governments expressed their pleasure when Premium agreed to undertake it because of the crisis caused by the shortage of iron ore, and co-operated in many ways to assist in the development. The development proved to be a great success and means much to our Canadian economy.

In 1953, ten years after the contract was executed, delivered to the various governmental authorities in Canada and the United States, and made public, and after the success of the project was fully demonstrated, the United States taxing authorities sought to levy a tax against Premium on the spread between the nominal price and the then quoted market on similar shares which, with penalties and interest, amount to more than $3,000,000. The tax claimed amounted to more than the total market value of the shares which Premium was entitled to retain.

The United States taxing authorities are also attempting to tax the two major stockholders of Premium, viz., Cyrus S. Eaton and Wm. R. Daley, on the identical alleged income arising out of the same transaction. This assessment against these individuals occurred nearly one and one-half years after the attempted assessment against Premium. While ordinarily Canada would not interfere in the assessment of taxes by the United States government against United States citizens, however unjust, the assessment is so obviously an attempt to force a settlement by Premium of this improper tax claim that it is at least shocking to Canadians if not a matter for representations by our government to the United States.

If this attempt by the United States to tax this transaction is successful, it will pave the way for many attacks against Canadian corporations which have been organized with the aid of U.S. capital to develop the natural resources of Canada. Certainly, it will deter future participation by U.S. capital in our development.

We regard this action by the United States government as an unfriendly act and it certainly is one which will not improve relations which are so necessary between our countries.

We will not attempt to explain the motives behind this unusual action by the United States government. We do, however, most sincerely and vigorously protest against this arrogant attempt to subject us to the jurisdiction of the United States tax authorities and their courts, and we respectfully request your assistance in bringing this to the attention of the United States government so that an end will be put to this continued harassment and unfair publicity against our Company.

The enclosed editorials from various Canadian publications illustrate the indignation of the Canadian public in this matter.

Respectfully yours,
[D.O. MUNGOVAN]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, May 23, 1956

My dear Colleague:

On May 17th. you sent me a confidential letter† dealing with the complaint of Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited against United States taxation. You enclosed a copy of your letter to Dr. McCann and Mr. Howe on this subject together with a copy of a letter, dated May 11th., which you received from Mr. Burchell setting forth the case for representations by the Canadian government to the United States government regarding their action.

It seems to me that the company has, to a considerable extent, overstated its case. For example, I cannot take too seriously the claim that if the United States government succeeds in enforcing this tax claim that other important Canadian companies will be similarly exposed. As I understand it, the United States claim is based entirely on the assertion that the Canadian company was actively carrying on business in the United States. If this is the case, then there is nothing unusual at all about the company's liability for tax on the profits earned in the United States. Our treaty with the United States, and with all other countries with whom we have agreements, recognizes this right of every country to tax profits earned in their country. Ordinarily as between Canada and the United States each allows its own resident companies to offset against its home tax — the tax paid to the other government on profits earned in that country.

It seems to me the company has no claim whatsoever for more than its first three years of operation. As I understand it Canada taxed the company from 1945 onward and now the United States assert a claim for tax for the same period. There is nothing wrong with this procedure. If the United States were able to establish a tax liability on profits earned in the United States, then by treaty we would allow an offset against the Canadian tax for the United States tax.

Where, it seems to me, the company has a fair case is in respect of its first three years of operation. As I understand it, the Steep Rock project was a matter of active interest on the part of our two governments, and that the United States government made a loan of $5,000,000 to the company in order to encourage the flow of iron ore from Canada to the United States. Canada granted the company a three year exemption (both Steep Rock and Premium). The company assumed (perhaps incorrectly) that it was operating in such a way that it was not liable for United States tax. The United States now claim a tax for these three years (as well as for all succeeding years). In particular the United States proposes to tax the value of the shares in Steep Rock which were sold to Premium for one cent a share (i.e. value in excess of one cent). Presumably the company is to be charged with having received this "money's worth" in consideration of the service of selling the output of Steep Rock. In addition it is to be taxed on its income in the form of a 2% commission on sales.

It seems to me that it may be properly argued that this stock transaction was an essential incentive for the company to go ahead with the project which was obviously desired by both governments. It can be claimed quite strongly, I think, that the company would never have proceeded with the project if they had known that the United States government would subsequently levy a tax on this financial benefit which constituted an important incentive for the company to proceed. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be quite appropriate for our government to argue with the United States government the unfairness of this subsequent action in attempting to tax away a large part of the financial advantage which was offered by our government and by Steep Rock as incentives for the company to proceed with the project.

I do not think there would be anything to be gained by a conference between officials nor, it seems to me, is the subject one which would need a high level conference. The case, as I see it, for complaint can be very simply stated as I have done above in a note presumably to the Secretary of the Treasury. Possibly, though, this should go direct from you to the Secretary of State. A possible alternative might be a letter from either Dr. McCann or Mr. Howe to Mr. George Humphreys.[130]

Yours very truly,

CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LIMITED

Following our telephone conversations last evening I arranged to call this morning, May 26, on the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr. The Secretary and Under-Secretary of the Treasury, with whom I had first thought of communicating, are both out of town for the weekend.

2. As instructed I told Hoover that the purpose of my visit was to inform him that next week the Canadian Cabinet would be considering the claim which US tax authorities were pressing against the above company in respect of certain wartime operations. This I was doing immediately because the hearing in the US court of tax appeals was to proceed on Monday morning, May 28. I added that, in speaking to him, he would understand that the Canadian Government had, of course, no intention or desire to interfere with the processes of the US courts.

3. In describing, briefly, to Hoover the circumstances under which the Canadian and US Governments cooperated to encourage Steep Rock and Premium to expedite production of iron ore for the common war effort I made use of Mr. Harris' letter, quoted in your telegram under reference.

4. I said to Hoover that, at the moment, we were not making any representations, nor were we asking for any action on the part of the US Government. On instructions, however, I was drawing it to the attention of US authorities that this was a matter of importance upon which representations had been made to us of such a character that they would be considered by the Cabinet this coming week.

5. Hoover listened patiently to what I had to say and from his interjections made it obvious that he was well acquainted with the case. He said that the State Department would inform the Treasury immediately of our conversation, but did not suggest what effect, if any, this might have on the court proceedings on Monday.

6. Hoover then added that the circumstances in this case were very complicated. He hoped that before the Canadian Cabinet made any decision they would have before them the facts available to US authorities. In this connection he drew attention to the provision of our tax convention which provided for direct contact between our fiscal authorities. It appeared to him that our taxation officials should get together at once.

[130] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
Referred to Mr. Heeney by telegram by Minister — most immediate. M. W[ershof]

7. Finally, Hoover made it quite clear that the Secretary of the Treasury himself was fully aware of the points at issue and he hinted, quite broadly, that the US Treasury would stand pretty firm, in spite of the many and varied pressures which had been brought to bear in many quarters.

CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LTD.; COMPLAINT AGAINST U.S. TAXATION

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs explained that Premium Iron Ores Limited had been incorporated as a Canadian company in 1942 to assist in the sales made by Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited. As part of the financing arrangements, Premium had been sold nearly 1.5 million shares of Steep Rock at 1 cent per share, though the stock at the time was listed on the market at $1.67. This arrangement had been known to the Department of National Revenue which had said that no Canadian tax would be levied on the transaction. The U.S. taxing authorities now claimed that the difference in price of $1.66 was a profit to Premium, taxable in the United States because, in their opinion, Premium had a "permanent establishment" in the U.S. in 1943 (and subsequently), within the meaning of U.S. law and of the Double Taxation Convention between the two countries. It was also alleged in the claim that this profit was given for "services rendered in the U.S."

An assessment notice had been sent to Premium in Toronto in 1953 which had been appealed to the U.S. Court of Tax Appeals. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue had advised the U.S. Commissioner of Internal Revenue that Premium claimed it had no "permanent establishment" in the U.S. This was disputed. Subsequently, the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury was asked that the case be postponed so that it could be further discussed between officials of the two revenue departments. The case was, in fact, put over and was due to be heard on May 28th of this year.

On May 15th, Premium formally asked the government to make representations to the U.S. government for the withdrawal of the claim, amounting to approximately $3 million, and that similar representations be made on another claim against the two principal stockholders who were U.S. citizens residing in the U.S.

There was no doubt that the Department of National Revenue was entitled, under the tax convention, to discuss this or any other such case with the U.S. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and there were sound arguments for and against intervening at this stage. The question to be decided was, should the government agree to Premium's request and, if so, what form should the representations take.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 28, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 123-56†).

10. Mr. Pearson added that he had brought this matter forward in response to requests from several quarters. He had already instructed the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to tell the U.S. authorities that Canada had no desire to interfere with the ordinary U.S. judicial processes, but that there was considerable interest in the case here and that the matter was being considered by the Canadian government. Mr. Heeney had emphasized that both Canada and the U.S. had encouraged Steep Rock and Premium to undertake the production of iron ore to meet urgent war requirements.

11. The Minister of National Revenue referred to the number of representations made to him on the subject and to the fact that all had asserted strongly that, if Premium were taxed in both countries, there would be a breach of the convention. However, it was his view that no attempt should be made to interfere with the U.S. court proceedings.

12. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The original transaction appeared to have been connected with a loan of $5 million to Steep Rock from the U.S. Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It would seem quite inadvisable to intervene in a case which had such a complicated history in the U.S.

(b) It was argued, on the other hand, that the government had an obligation, under the convention for the avoidance of double taxation, to protect the legitimate interests of Canadian companies and individuals. Premium and its principal shareholders had been able to convince opinion in some quarters, particularly in Nova Scotia, that the action by the U.S. was unjust and that the government should step in and help. At least intergovernmental discussions should be held.

(c) The U.S. State Department had proposed that the two taxing authorities should consult on the matter, even though some discussions had been held already. It might be advisable to follow up this suggestion, but it would be a mistake to make diplomatic representations while the case was before the U.S. courts.

(d) The main legal point at issue before the court was whether Premium had a "permanent establishment" in the United States. There was nothing Canada could do to settle this question, nor would there be anything that could ultimately be done, if it were decided by judicial process that Premium did have such an establishment. However, it might be useful to have an observer at the hearings to assess whether the outcome appeared to be in violation of the convention or not.

(e) Premium was not a bona fide mining company, yet it had been granted tax concessions for the first three years of its operations. This seemed to be a fairly loose interpretation of the regulations, though nothing could be done now to alter the ruling.

(f) The U.S. Secretary of the Treasury had the authority to waive or remit the taxes in question. When a judgement had been rendered, the government should then decide, after a review of the circumstances at the time, whether or not it was advisable to intervene formally.

13. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the complaint of Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited against taxation by the United States and agreed:

(a) that, following the informal suggestion of the U.S. State Department, discussions be arranged at an early date between taxation officials of the two countries;

(b) that an observer follow the case before the U.S. courts and report on its progress and outcome; and,

(c) that a memorandum be prepared for Mr. Winters outlining the duties of the Canadian government under the Reciprocal Tax Convention in regard to particular cases of companies or individuals who believed they were improperly taxed by the United States.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 19, 1956

CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LTD.

As directed, I attended the meeting in Mr. Winters office this morning at which the following were also present:

Mr. Duncan MacTavish
Dr. A.K. Eaton, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Finance
Mr. McEntyre, Deputy Minister, Department of National Revenue
Mr. Sheppard, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of National Revenue

2. Mr. Winters indicated that he had hoped to have this meeting take place in Dr. McCann's office but he had understood that Dr. McCann was not likely to be back in Ottawa by today. He gathered that in fact Dr. McCann was not in town.

3. Mr. Winters explained that his interest in this case was not related to his position as Minister of Public Works. It derived rather from the fact that as a member of the Government he was troubled by the rather widespread impression that the Canadian Government was not taking an interest in the treatment being given by the U.S. Government to a Canadian firm. This view had been expressed quite strongly in newspapers in his own province.

The keenness of his interest was affected in some degree by the fact that Mr. Cyrus Eaton had property in his constituency. He was not, however, concerned with Cyrus Eaton's personal tax difficulties since he was a U.S. resident and would have to look after himself. What he was bothered about was the position of the Canadian firm, Premium Iron Ores Ltd. He added that Mr. MacTavish was present as the distinguished counsel for the Canadian company affected.

4. As Mr. Winters understood the position, there were two aspects of the case which needed to be examined:

(a) the possibility that a U.S. court might rule that a firm had a "permanent establishment" in the United States when in fact it was clear to everybody that the nationality of the firm was Canadian. (Mr. Winters did not appear to realize that a firm could be "Canadian" and still have a "permanent establishment" in the United States. He seemed to think that if it were to be argued that such a firm had a permanent establishment elsewhere its Canadian identity was being questioned.); and

(b) the inability, as a consequence, of the Canadian Government to continue taxing that firm. (In this connection Mr. Winters did not appear to appreciate that the firm would continue to be subject to Canadian tax and that any deduction would be confined to the U.S. tax on the earnings attributable to the "permanent establishment" in the United States.)

5. In connection with the former of these points, Mr. Winters thought it was unreasonable and dangerous that the U.S. authorities who were making the submission, or the U.S. court which would be giving the ruling, should be permitted to define the term "permanent establishment" in a manner which could prejudice not only our tax agreement with the United States but also the agreements which we have with other countries and the numerous agreements which the United States has with various countries throughout the world. Mr. McEntyre was not aware that there was anything improper in this procedure or in the way the U.S. authorities were attempting to define this term. The Canadian authorities themselves had brought a case sometime ago in which they had attempted to demonstrate that a U.S. firm had a "permanent establishment" in Canada. They had resorted to much the same kind of evidence as that which the U.S. was introducing in this case. Mr. McEntyre thought that the evidence in the Canadian case had been considerably stronger but even that had not satisfied the tax court and the case was lost. The U.S. authorities had not intervened in any way in that case and had not questioned the right of the Canadian Government or the Canadian courts to determine whether or not a permanent establishment existed within the meaning of the Convention. If the court had found in favour of the Government the U.S. authorities might of course have had something to say but that would have been a different matter from commenting on the court proceedings or on the attempt of the Canadian Government to make a case within its interpretation of the terms of the Convention. Mr. McEntyre and Dr. Eaton did not think that Mr. Fortas had good grounds for his worries concerning the consequences of a ruling by a U.S. court involving definitions of terms which had not been precisely agreed upon between the two Governments. (These worries, which were referred to by Mr. MacTavish, are apparently those expressed in Mr. Fortas' memorandum† of June 28 which is on our file.) The U.S. appeared to be trying, in a fairly reasonable manner, to do what our authorities had previously attempted in the case referred to above.

6. If the U.S. Government succeeded in demonstrating that Premium had a permanent establishment in the United States (which Mr. McEntyre personally thought they would have difficulty in doing on the evidence so far produced) there could be little question of their right to impose tax in respect of income attributable to that establishment. This was a basic principle in our Convention with the United States. Moreover in this instance there could scarcely be a question of double taxation since the bulk of the transactions involved had been exempted from Canadian tax. There was a relatively small item which might duplicate tax which Canada had collected but the U.S. Internal Revenue people had intimated to Mr. McEntyre that if they won their case the reconciliation of the claims of the two Governments with respect to this item could be discussed.

7. Mr. Winters and Mr. MacTavish referred then to the implication or innuendo in the U.S. Government's submission (which Mr. MacTavish said was even more explicit in some of the oral remarks of counsel) that the co-operation of Canadian officials reflected support by the Canadian Government for the case which Internal Revenue was attempting to make. Mr. McEntyre doubted that any such interpretation was warranted but agreed that if this impression had been created it might be desirable to try to remove it.

8. Finally there was discussion on the desirability of going further and pointing out to the U.S. authorities that when Canada had granted the original tax exemption it had not contemplated that the United States would be applying its taxes to the same transaction which both Governments presumably regarded as "war service". Dr. Eaton thought there was no legal basis for criticising the United States on this score but he felt a moral case might be made. At least we might express our "indignation" that when we had done without tax revenue on something which was in the interests of the common war effort the United States should think at this stage of attempting to extract tax revenue for itself. Mr. Sheppard recounted some of the history of the case and raised some doubt as to whether the transaction which we had exempted was in fact identical with the transaction which the United States was now endeavouring to tax. Mr. McEntyre appeared to have doubts about how right or wise it would be to pursue the argument that because we had given an exemption therefore the United States should also have done so (or should now do so). I pointed out that the Canadian Ambassador had already mentioned to the Acting Secretary or State the details of the original Canadian tax exemption and I was confident that the counsel for the Company would also have made a good deal out of this transaction in his brief. I added that when we had been consulted about the propriety of recalling this history and drawing some moral from it we had expressed the view that it would not be improper to bring these matters to the attention of the U.S. authorities if the Government were to decide that this should be done. Mr. Winters remarked that he himself had some doubts about how far this argument should be carried in any formal representations to the United States. He thought that possibly the interpretation to be placed on the co-operation given by Canadian officials might be included in a formal submission to the U.S. Government but this other matter might merely be referred to orally. In any event the whole question would doubtless be considered in Cabinet again.

9. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Winters said that he would be reporting to the Prime Minister that this discussion had taken place. I repeated my assumption that nothing which had been said at the meeting was to be taken as implying that those present necessarily considered it wise to proceed further with representations to the United States. I added that I could not say how we would be advising our Minister, if our advice were to be sought.

10. I am attaching spare copies of this memorandum which you might wish to send to Mr. Bryce and possibly to the Embassy in Washington if you see fit.[131]

CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LIMITED; COMPLAINT AGAINST U.S. TAXATION
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE JUNE 2)

18. The Prime Minister said he had received a lengthy letter from Mr. Burchill, Mr. Cyrus Eaton's counsel in connection with his Canadian interests, on the attempted claim of the U.S. government to collect income and excess profits tax from Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited. This communication dealt with the operations of the company since its beginning and recounted the steps taken to obtain information from the Canadian revenue authorities in connection with the U.S. Department of Internal Revenue's investigation of the case. Statements made at the trial concerning this latter aspect of the matter could in Mr. Burchill's view, only lead the trial judge to conclude that the Canadian government was supporting the claim of the U.S. government to collect these taxes.

19. Mr. St-Laurent felt it would be desirable, therefore, to send an aide-mémoire to the U.S. Secretary of State attaching Mr. Burchill's views as to what appeared to be a fair statement of the facts in the case, and pointing out that the Canadian government did not wish it to appear that it was supporting the U.S. claim. The aide-mémoire would go on to say that National Revenue officials had co-operated with the U.S. officials in accordance with the obligations of the convention between the two countries for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion, and that the Canadian government had not contemplated any U.S. tax applicable to the operations of the company at the time that the Canadian government, as a war measure, had granted a three year exemption from income and excess profits taxes.

20. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Under the common law it was clear that no country assisted a foreign country in the collection of revenue. The tax convention altered that as between Canada and United States insofar as the provision of information was concerned.

(b) It might not be desirable to express the opinion that the Canadian government thought the company would be free of all excess profits and income tax for the first three years of its operations. The case might be allowed to run its regular course in the courts. The main point at issue was the lack of understanding of the reasons why the original exemption was authorized by Canada.

(c) On the other hand, it was important to change the wrong impression made in the U.S. that the Canadian government was supporting the claim.

21. The Cabinet noted the report of the Prime Minister on the court case in the United States involving a U.S. government claim for collection of income and excess profits tax from Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited, and agreed that an aide-mémoire along the lines suggested, but amended in the light of the discussion, be given to the United States Department of State.[132]

THE TAX CASE INVOLVING CONSOLIDATED PREMIUM IRON ORES LTD

Please pass the following to the Prime Minister in answer to his letter to me:

that you had asked me, after a good deal of thought and deliberation with your colleagues in Cabinet, to submit to him the views of the Canadian Government in the tax case involving consolidated Premium. I asked Hoover if he would look into this matter himself and he undertook to do so. We also arranged that I should leave a copy of the aide mémoire at first opportunity with Thorsten Kalijarvi, who is the senior official on the economic side of the State Department. This I did this morning under a letter of transmittal to the Acting Secretary of State.

I went over the ground again with Kalijarvi, stressing the two points made in the final paragraph of our aide mémoire, namely that the USA Government should be under no illusion that Canada supports the tax claim against consolidated and that on the contrary it had not been contemplated at the time the original arrangements were made that there would be any USA tax applicable to the operations of the company on which a tax claim was now being made.

Kalijarvi knew, of course, that I had been speaking to Hoover, and he made no substantive comments. He did enquire about what we intended to tell the press. He said that they had had a number of enquiries. I told him what I understood you had agreed to tell the press in Ottawa yesterday, namely that representations were being made for the purpose of removing any misapprehension as a result of the cooperation given by Canadian tax officials to USA tax officials in accordance with the tax convention and protocol between the two countries. Kalijarvi said that the State Department would follow the same line.

Yours sincerely.

Note de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington], March 14, 1957

PREMIUM IRON ORES TAX CASE

This morning Mr. Cyrus J. Eaton (at his request) called at the Embassy. The Ambassador, together with Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Sainsbury discussed various aspects of the Premium Iron Ores tax case with him.

2. Mr. Eaton produced a copy of a letter† (dated in February) which he had written to the Prime Minister, together with Mr. St. Laurent's reply.† In his letter Mr. Eaton had expressed his concern and dissatisfaction that the Canadian authorities had not made vigorous protests to the U.S. Government concerning the attempt of the U.S. Internal Revenue Service to levy taxes on Premium Iron Ores Ltd. in respect of its wartime operations. He recognized that the Ambassador had called on Mr. Herbert Hoover, Jr. and that an aide mémoire on the subject had been delivered to the State Department in November, but it was his understanding from talks with State Department and Congressional people that the Ambassador had indicated that the matter was "purely routine" and that no "representations" had been made. Commenting upon his letter, Mr. Eaton went on to say that his contacts in the State Department and Congress led him to believe that the Canadian Government's attitude had been such as to suggest to the U.S. authorities that it was not seriously concerned about the U.S. tax claim. It was, however, quite clear from the Prime Minister's reply to Mr. Eaton's letter that Mr. St. Laurent rejected Mr. Eaton's interpretation; the Prime Minister's letter related the facts concerning the aide mémoire and its presentation by Mr. Heeney, explained that the State Department was fully aware of the Canadian Government's position, and stated that, in his view, the Government had gone as far as it properly could on this issue.

3. Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's letter, Mr. Eaton reverted several times to the "views" of State Department officials and Congressmen that the Canadian Government was not actually concerned at this attempt of the U.S. Internal Revenue Service to tax a Canadian company. He produced a copy of a letter of December 20th last from the State Department to Senator Smathers which, while not wholly inaccurate in its references to the Ambassador's conversations with the State Department, was incomplete in that it mentioned only one of the two points made in the aide mémoire and quite misleading. This letter was apparently signed by the Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations, Robert C. Hill. We understood from what Mr. Eaton said that he had taken upon himself to see that parts of this letter were brought to the attention of the Canadian Government. (This probably explains the origin of the so-called "report" to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which was sent to us some weeks ago.)

4. In going back over the history of the tax case, Mr. Eaton expressed his view that the tax claim against Premium and himself originated solely because a person who discovers, and informs on, a tax claim that can be successfully prosecuted gets 25% of the proceeds. He then brought up his visit to T. Coleman Andrews, formerly Commissioner of Internal Revenue, some time ago in which he alleged that he had received assurance that the case would be dropped if there was any indication of objection or protest from the Canadian Government. He also referred to a visit by Dr. McCann to Mr. Andrews, in which he claimed that Dr. McCann had protested against this effort to tax a Canadian company and in which Dr. McCann had been assured by U.S. officials that, if he was prepared to put his protest in writing, the case would be dropped. On his return to Ottawa (Mr. Eaton went on), Dr. McCann had decided against this idea and sent a "very wishy-washy" letter (to Internal Revenue), which did not indicate that Canada had any real objections to the case.

5. Mr. Eaton then referred to the visit which the Ambassador had made to Mr. Hoover in May of 1956 to express Canada's concern with the tax case against Premium. Mr. Eaton said that, after this interview, Mr. Hoover had been most impressed by the Canadian position; it was not until the following Monday, after a phone call from Secretary Humphrey, that Mr. Hoover had decided that in reality the Canadian attitude was not strong enough to warrant the U.S. reconsidering the claim against Premium. According to Mr. Eaton, Secretary Humphrey was able to give Mr. Hoover this assurance because of a telephone conversation he had had with Mr. C.D. Howe over the weekend.

6. At this point Mr. Eaton expressed himself concerning Mr. Humphrey. He said that, while he and the Secretary were "social" friends, they were bitter business competitors. Never in the history of U.S. Government, Eaton went on, had any Government official used his position to widen his business interest and influences as had Mr. Humphrey. He as much as stated that the real reason that the tax case had not been dropped was that Mr. Humphrey saw these proceedings as a way to weaken Mr. Eaton's business interests and strengthen Hanna's position. He added that not only some individual Senators (Republican and Democratic) but also the Republican Policy Committee were taking an interest in this case, and that Mr. Humphrey might shortly be called to the Hill to "explain".

7. Mr. Eaton then referred to a talk he had had with President Eisenhower during the Greenbrier conference, and remarked that the President had drawn him aside and said how

"he and Mamie" sympathized with him over the tax problems that he was involved in. He said the President mentioned that "their very good friend, George Allen," (as a participant in Premium) was also being affected. According to Eaton the President thought it "unfortunate" that the Canadian Government had not registered any protest against this tax claim.

8. The main theme of Mr. Eaton's remarks was that the Canadian Government's attitude towards something which should be of serious concern to them had been from the beginning very weak. The Canadian officials had cooperated much more than was necessary or even legal with the U.S. tax officials investigating the case. They had not protested the claim to the U.S. Government, and the aide mémoire had been presented in such a way as to minimize any possibility of its exerting an influence on the U.S. authorities.

9. Mr. Eaton seemed to think that it was some sort of conspiracy between Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Howe which had brought about this situation. He mentioned that vigorous protests in newspapers were being made in Canada from coast to coast against the action of the U.S. tax authorities and also against the lack of vigorous action on the part of the Canadian Government. He referred to the fact that the Ungava ore project was in great jeopardy because of the possibility that U.S. tax authorities in ten years or so could reach into Canada and levy heavy taxes against this operation in the same way as they were endeavouring to do against Premium. He pointed out that Premier Duplessis had put through the legislation necessary for the project to begin operation in Quebec, but that in view of the present situation he (Eaton) felt that reconsideration of this project would now have to be given by its backers even though plans had been made for an impressive ceremonial launching of the project in the next few months.

10. In replying to Mr. Eaton's allegations concerning the conveying of Canadian views and the transmission of the aide mémoire to the State Department, the Ambassador denied categorically and emphatically that he had said or implied to Hoover or Kalijarvi that this was a "routine" matter in which the Government had no concern; on the contrary, the facts as outlined in the Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Eaton were precisely correct. The Ambassador went on to explain that he had discussed the Premium tax case with Mr. Hoover in both May and November of last year. In the course of these discussions he had commented to Hoover that the expression of Canadian views on the matter should not be taken to mean that the Canadian Government was attempting to interfere in U.S. judicial processes; this, of course, was a natural comment to make since Canada would not wish any such interference to be attempted by the U.S. if the positions were reversed. Such a comment, the Ambassador continued, could by no stretch of the imagination be construed in a way that would suggest that the presentation of the aide mémoire to the U.S. authorities was made in a "routine" manner. Mr. Heeney pointed out that, on the basis of most recent talks with State Department officials, it was clear that they were fully apprised of the Canadian position and that the aide mémoire had been passed along to the proper U.S. officials in the two Departments of U.S. Government concerned — Treasury and Justice. Mr. Heeney wanted Mr. Eaton to be very clear on this situation; the Embassy's instructions from Ottawa had been promptly and accurately carried out and the Government's position precisely stated to the U.S. authorities. Mr. Eaton would not expect him to comment on the other allegations he had made.

11. Mr. Eaton then went on again at some length about the "cooperation" which had been shown by the Canadian Government to U.S. tax officials in their preparation of this case. This had suggested to the U.S. authorities concerned that the Canadian Government did not view with anything but equanimity the tax claim against Premium. He made some slighting references to the alleged activities of Mr. McEntyre in attempting to influence other Deputy Ministers in Ottawa. He thought that Mr. McEntyre had "accidentally" become involved in this cooperation with the U.S. and now felt bound to defend it.

12. When asked what his lawyers thought of the outcome of the case, he merely said that in their view the whole thing was strictly illegal, but that they could not tell what influences had been brought to bear and what the probable outcome of the case would be. He again referred to the effect which this case would have on the investment or risk capital in Canada and the problems it had raised already in connection with the Ungava project.

13. In leaving Mr. Eaton expressed his gratitude for the explanations given him of the Embassy's part in these events.[134] means, the marketing of the Canadian crop in Canada would not present too serious a problem. Canadian apricot growers had an understanding with California growers whereby each group respected the other's markets. However, no such agreement existed with apricot growers in the State of Washington where recent crops had been heavy, and it was feared that substantial movement of apricots from here to British Columbia might cause a serious drop in Canadian prices. The most practical solution might be to suggest that the B.C. producers endeavour to reach an agreement with the growers in the State of Washington, similar to that which they had with California growers.

On April 23, 1957, the United States Tax Court decided in favour of Premium Iron Ores Limited. For the details of the decision, see 'Consolidated Premium Iron Ores Limited, et al.*, Petitioners, v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Respondent' in T.C. Vol. 28, No. 19, p. 127.

There was a much more serious problem in the Canadian turkey market. During the previous year, some 12 million pounds of turkey had been imported into Canada from the U.S. Imports of U.S. turkeys in approximately the same volume this year would not have any serious effect. However, the very much increased production of turkeys in the U.S. during the current year made likely a much larger volume of sales to Canada, which would likely be followed by a significant drop in the price of Canadian turkeys. Perhaps the government might place turkey imports under some quota system pending tariff negotiations in the fall. If such a quota system were established, turkey producers thought that, in addition to imports already made during the current year, another 5 million pounds might be allowed in from the U.S. A quota system, however, could not be set up unless the price of turkeys was supported or market conditions were such that Canada could claim "serious injury" under the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

A third problem had arisen in connection with the coming fruit crop in the Niagara Peninsula. Producers in that area were most anxious that the government should take some form of restrictive action against imports to ensure economic prices and favourable market conditions for Canadian fruit growers. In this instance, however, since the first fruit crop would not be gathered for some considerable time, there was no basis on which direct government action could be taken.

40. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Finance and agreed,

(a) that the apricot growers of the Okanagan Valley in British Columbia be informed that the government was prepared to support any steps they might take in an endeavour to reach an agreement with the apricot growers of the State of Washington similar to that in existence with the California growers;

(b) that the Departments of Finance, Agriculture, and Trade and Commerce consider further the problems that might arise as a result of increased turkey imports from the United States, on the understanding that the government might be prepared, pending tariff negotiations in the fall, to place turkeys temporarily under import control in much the same manner as had been done for cheddar cheese; and,

(c) that the fruit growers in the Niagara Peninsula be informed that the government was carefully studying their representations with regard to problems that might arise during the current year, with a view to determining what action, if any, should be taken to protect them against abnormal competition from imports.

FRESH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

Following is the substance of a statement that will be made tonight on behalf of the government. Would you please inform the State Department. Text begins:

In the past few months the government has received representations from fruit and vegetable growers in various parts of the country about import competition from the United States.

2. It is my understanding that the growers are concerned about two problems. The central problem is that because of price increases and changes in production and marketing techniques which have occurred in recent years, the growers feel that the specific duties applicable during the Canadian marketing season are too low in some cases, and applicable during too short a period in other cases. There are a variety of fruits and vegetables and a solution suitable for one may not be suitable for the other. The whole matter is being carefully studied and the government desires to do what is necessary to deal with this situation. Changes of this kind are, of course, a matter for negotiation under our trade agreements with the U.S. The U.S. has been informed of our difficulties. As soon as our work has been completed, if the facts warrant it, we intend to enter into negotiations as soon as possible with a view to meeting the problem.

3. The other matter which the growers have brought to our attention is a more immediate one. We have been told that for certain fruits bumper crops are anticipated this season on both sides of the border, and that unless special measures are introduced, serious marketing difficulties will occur. We are keeping the situation under close scrutiny from day to day. It is still too early to know exactly what the situation will be. No fruits of the kind in question are moving across the border in appreciable quantities at the present time and it will be some time yet before the Canadian crop will be ready for market. If the situation which the growers fear should develop and fresh fruits should move into Canada at abnormally low prices, the government intends to take action to prevent serious injury to the Canadian fruit growing industry. To this end, should it prove necessary, the government intends to avail itself of the authority under the Customs Act as well as the emergency escape clause of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to prevent imports of fruits from moving into Canada at prices which would result in serious damage to Canadian growers. Text ends. Message ends.

TURKEYS

On May 27 Cabinet gave consideration to the question of turkeys and instructed officials

(a) that it was the Government's wish somehow to provide some additional insulation to the Canadian market for the current season, beyond what is provided by the present Canadian tariff; and

(b) that the present tariff arrangements were to be reviewed for possible renegotiation later this year.

2. The Embassy in Washington was asked to find out whether there were any means at the disposal of the U.S. authorities for insulating the Canadian turkey market from some of the pressures that are developing. They have replied that there is no U.S. legislation which could be used for this purpose, and it did not appear that the exporters themselves could cooperate to restrict their shipments.

3. It has been impossible to get Mr. Harris' views since this report from Washington was received.

4. Mr. Harris spoke to representatives of the Canadian Turkey Federation last Sunday and three of them (names attached *) spent all this afternoon with officials exploring ways and means of insulating the Canadian market in the immediate future and until the tariff can be renegotiated. It has not been possible in these explorations to find any means yet which would be both possible (under existing legislation) and effective to protect the Canadian producers. The producers do not, except as a last resort, want price supports nor do they want a total embargo against U.S. exports. There is, however, no Canadian legislation under which quotas could be imposed against the United States unless there was a price support scheme in which the Canadian Government participated to effectively support the Canadian price. Nor is there a Canadian organization with which the Canadian Government could enter into an agreement such as was recently signed on cheese, the Canadian Turkey Federation notwithstanding.

4. As for tariffs, the Government cannot of course raise the present rates except by legislative action.

5. Other avenues were also explored; e.g., the use of the Canadian health regulations, but proved to be blind alleys. The Federation spokesman also confirmed the word we had from Washington that the U.S. producers and traders would not voluntarily limit their exports, particularly in the face of insistent demands by importers here (even though they are sympathetic with the Canadian producers' problems and their Canadian sales of 12,000,000 pounds a year are only a small fraction of their total business).

6. The C.T.F. representatives are fully cognizant of the difficulties outlined above of trying to find a legal basis for what they ask, namely, a yearly import quota of about 6.8 million pounds, or roughly half the present rate of shipments.

7. In regard to any public statement, these representatives were very clear in warning against any statement which might precipitate further imports into Canada. They have been doing what they can to kill a rumour that the matter had been settled, a quota established, and the duty raised to 2¢ a pound.

8. Bearing this danger in mind it is suggested that if you wish to make any remarks on this subject they might be along the lines of the attached draft.†

TURKEYS

1. There was a meeting with representatives of the turkey growers in Mr. Plumptre's office on May 31st. In addition to departmental representatives the following were present:

Mr. Donovan, Ontario Turkey Association
Mr. Bond, Ontario Turkey Association
Mr. Patterson, Ontario Turkey Association
Mr. Couillard, Department of External Affairs
Mr. Isbister, Department of Trade & Commerce
Mr. Davey, Department of Agriculture.

2. Mr. Plumptre pointed out that in accordance with ministerial instructions, the Government was exploring means of averting the potential threat to Canadian marketings which might result from the anticipated surplus of turkeys in the United States. One of the problems was that a Government announcement to this effect might bring about large-scale speculative buying of U.S. turkeys, particularly since it appears that adequate refrigerated storage space is available in Canada at this time.

3. It was pointed out that there were at least two alternative forms of Government action which would satisfy legislative requirements necessary for the imposition of import controls:

(a) the Government could make agreements under the Agricultural Co-operative Marketing Act for the purpose of guaranteeing an initial payment to turkey growers. After discussion, it was concluded that the existing co-operative marketing organizations, mainly in the West and in Quebec, covered too small a proportion of total turkey production to provide an adequate base under our legislation for justifying import restrictions. Furthermore, the administrative problems would be great, in view of the many small co-operative organizations;

(b) the Government could support the price of turkeys directly under the authority of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. It was recognized that it would be difficult to determine an appropriate support level. On the one hand, the support price should not be at a level which would unduly encourage production. On the other hand, the support should be at a realistic level to avoid criticism that it merely serves as a device for restricting imports.

4. The discouragement of imports by means of a more painstaking examination to detect hormone-treated birds was considered impractical.

5. The representatives of the turkey growers reiterated their previous stand that they would prefer the imposition of import controls without price support. Although recognizing that from a legislative point of view some form of price support would be necessary, they were particularly afraid that the support price might become the ceiling price and that consequently, in the long-run, action of this kind might work out to the disadvantage of the industry. On the other hand, too high a support price would cause over-production and general disorganization. The turkey growers suggested that a price of 32¢ a pound, live, Toronto, would be at or near the break-even point and would therefore be a reasonable support level; they intimated that anything drastically below this level might cause them to press for a downward revision of the proposed import quota.

The delegation submitted on behalf of the Canadian Turkey Federation a proposal calling for a quota on U.S. imports this year amounting to 6,856,000 lbs. This figure was based on an average of imports during the past five years, but since imports have increased sharply, it is only about half as much as last year's imports. This quota would serve until such time as the tariff could be re-negotiated with the United States; in this regard they had in mind some sort of tariff-quota arrangement. The turkey growers pointed out that Government action instituting a quota should not be too long delayed since banks and feed companies which finance a large part of turkey production might become restive in the face of the threat from United States imports. In their view, the United States turkey industry understands the Canadian problem and would not object too strenuously to the proposed restrictions.

6. It was pointed out on the official side that the United States may object to the proposed determination of a quota since it is based on an average over a period of time when market conditions changed quite drastically. Some doubt was expressed whether the proposed restrictions could keep Canadian prices above United States levels. Since the production of turkeys affords western grain growers an opportunity to convert surplus grain into cash, it would be unrealistic to expect the Canadian turkey industry to exercise a noticeable degree of self-restraint in the present situation; this might cause difficulties both internationally and on the domestic scene. The fear was expressed that the restriction on United States imports might interfere with the proper distribution of different types of birds for the Canadian market, and that consequently it may be necessary to establish separate quotas for broilers and heavy birds. There was also the danger that there might be some substitution in favour of a greater consumption of other kinds of fowl.

7. The turkey growers gave the assurance that they would get in touch with officials if a threat to orderly marketing should develop and they recommended that in the meantime the Government might make known that talks with turkey producers are still in progress and that no official decision has been made.

TELEGRAM E-875 Ottawa, June 7, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL. PRIORITY.

FRESH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

The government statement relating to import competition was used in a meeting on Tuesday night, May 28th, and the relevant parts appeared in the press in the Niagara Peninsula the following day. The Canadian Horticultural Council immediately approached the Department of Finance to enquire about the implications and implementation of the policy. Accordingly there was a general meeting between representatives of the Council and officials of the departments concerned on Monday, June 3rd, followed by meetings on Tuesday and Wednesday of smaller groups concerned with the two most immediate problems: apricots and strawberries.

2. It would seem pretty certain now that in due course the government will be seeking to renegotiate tariffs under Article XXVIII of the GATT with the United States (and others if necessary) on a number of fruits and vegetables. In the meanwhile the government will consider emergency action under Article XIX if cases of serious injury falling within the terms of that article are brought to its attention. The action would almost certainly involve the imposition of fixed values under Section 38 of the Customs Act. Anti-dumping duties under Section 6 of the Customs Tariff would be consequential.

3. The purpose of the meetings on apricots and strawberries was to consider the claims of the growers that their position warranted immediate escape clause action. While a certain amount of information remains to be collected, it is the impression of officials who took part in these meetings that a case can definitely be made regarding strawberries. In this connection action will have to be taken within the next week if it is to be effective this season. The case in regard to apricots would seem much weaker; the time of action is not quite so urgent; and it may be possible, now that growers in the State of Washington are getting organized, that some informal arrangements between growers' organizations on the two sides of the border may provide a degree of insulation that the Canadians will consider adequate.

4. A meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy has been called for today (Friday) to consider reports on the meetings with the growers and particularly the urgent case of strawberries. It seems likely that reports will subsequently be made to ministers indicating that a case for emergency action on strawberries can be made, both within the terms of the GATT and within the terms of Section 38 of the Customs Act.

5. On Wednesday Myron Black asked Plumptre what had happened subsequent to the government announcement and what products were under consideration. Plumptre told him very briefly of the meetings and mentioned strawberries and apricots but without indicating what the findings of officials were likely to be. Black asked Plumptre to keep him informed of further approaches relating to other products but Plumptre was not too committal and emphasized the confidential nature of the information that had just been communicated. (It had emerged in the general meeting with the Horticultural Council that at one time the U.S. Embassy here had provided a leak in advance of the dates on which increased seasonal tariffs went into effect, resulting in last minute rush movements of horticultural products in Canada.)

6. Since this was dictated the Interdepartmental Committee has agreed that there is no ground under GATT for action on apricots (in the near future at any rate) but that a strong case can be made on strawberries within the terms of GATT and our own legislation.

7. The above is all for your own information at this stage (with the exception of what Plumptre told Black), since any leak would have obvious consequences. If ministers decide to take action we hope to put you in a position to notify the U.S.A. (and we would intend to notify GATT) simultaneously with the announcement here.

FRESH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES; ARBITRARY CUSTOMS VALUES ON STRAWBERRIES
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MAY 27)

3. The Prime Minister said that urgent representations had been received from fruit and vegetable growers in Ontario concerning import competition from the United States. The growers were concerned about two problems. First, they felt that the protection afforded them through specific duties during the Canadian season was no longer adequate, and had asked that duties be raised in some cases and the seasonal protective period extended in others. Second, and more immediate, severe price competition was expected during the current season for a number of products and the imposition of fixed values on imported items was requested where there was a threat of serious injury.

Subsequent to the last discussion of these issues, the Minister of Finance had announced that the longer range problem would be studied and had referred to possible negotiations with the United States. He also had assured the growers that, should it prove necessary, the government would take action to prevent serious injury to the fruit growing industry. Following this announcement, officials held discussions with representatives of the growers who pressed for immediate action to establish fixed values on apricots and strawberries and indicated that similar requests would likely be forthcoming for a number of other items.

Detailed studies had been made of the apricot and strawberry situation and the evidence was reviewed by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy. As a result, it had been agreed that no grounds existed at this time for action on apricots under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade Escape Clause and the appropriate section of the Customs Act. However, as regards strawberries, it was agreed that the existing situation constituted an immediate threat of serious injury to producers. This was due principally to large stocks of frozen strawberries in the U.S. and a particularly heavy crop of fruit in California. Prices to growers there had declined to about 8 cents a pound compared with 14 to 18 cents in recent years.

The Canadian crop would come on the market in volume in the next few days and, should it be decided to protect the growers, immediate action was required. Under existing law the only means of providing this additional protection was the authority contained in section 38 of the Customs Act, by which the Governor in Council could authorize the Minister of National Revenue to fix the value for duty of imported fresh and frozen strawberries. Such authority might be valid for six months. No action was required at present on other forms of processed strawberries. The values proposed would make possible a return close to the average price prevailing in recent years.

Because of the time considerations involved, this step would mean no prior consultation with the G.A.T.T. and, under the relevant provision of the agreement, the U.S. would be free to take unilateral compensatory action against imports from Canada. Jam manufacturers here would be faced with higher raw material costs. On the other hand, the lower prices paid to U.S. manufacturers would not be apt to lead to a serious problem because the products of the two industries had not been directly competitive. A much more important consideration would be the creation of a precedent for other products in manufacturing, as well as in agriculture. The danger of pressure in this connection might be mitigated by stressing in a public statement the exceptional nature of the action and the peculiar circumstances of the fruit and vegetable industry. A draft statement† was submitted for consideration.

During the investigation of the problem it became apparent that the seasonal protection afforded the industry was ineffective because of the rise in the price level and that technological changes had significantly affected the long term competitive position of Canadian producers. It would therefore be useful to have the Tariff Board examine the appropriate tariff schedules and to advise on methods and rates for seasonal protection to the industry.

The Interdepartmental Committee had reached the following conclusions:

(a) There was at present no case for emergency action on apricots.

(b) A case could be made for such action on strawberries. Should this be done, values might be fixed for a period of six months on the fresh and frozen fruit at ranges from 13.5 cents to 23.5 cents.

(c) If emergency action were taken, consideration might be given to issuing a policy statement along the lines proposed.

(d) The Tariff Board might be requested to undertake a study of the tariff schedules on fresh fruit and vegetables.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Memorandum, Acting Chairman, Interdepartment Committee on External Trade Policy, June 12, 1957 — Cab. Doc. 110-57†).

4. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) If the present administration were to continue in office, there would be no hesitation in acting on strawberries. However, this might be inadvisable as it would be a very valuable precedent for a new administration in other cases. On the other hand, strawberries were due to come on the market in volume at any moment and, to protect the industry for this year, action had to be taken immediately. A deferred decision would be too late.

(b) Whether or not fixed values were authorized in this case, there was no doubt that in Ontario there was a strong demand for protection and steps would be taken, in any event, to afford appropriate levels of protection to fruit and vegetable growers and probably to other industries as well. Canada was about the only country that had not resorted to the escape clause procedures in the G.A.T.T.

(c) Acting on strawberries would raise the cost of living of those who had to sell their production on world markets. It would also strengthen the hand of those in the U.S. who wished to restrict imports of lead and zinc.

(d) No action except on strawberries was proposed at the present time, but apricots might well become critical in a few weeks and no doubt representations would be made for more protection for that particular fruit. The growers had also indicated that there might be five or six other fruit and vegetables for which they would request emergency action this season.

(e) U.S. strawberries were not being "dumped" into Canada in the traditional legal sense, nor was this an end-of-season, end-of-line problem. Prices all over the U.S. had collapsed or were about to fall due to large stocks and a large California crop. In these circumstances, dumping duties could not be applied. The fixed values suggested were slightly lower than the going price at the moment and would result in prices close to the average of recent years.

(f) Action was essential in the light of the commitment given to the growers. To refuse to honour it would be a breach of faith. Also, if it were not followed up, farmers would come to feel that they could not count on the Liberal Party. Statements had been made recently that agriculture should be as attractive as possible and that several things still had to be done to make it an appealing occupation. On the other hand, fishermen dependent on export markets would strongly resent this sort of protectionist action even in this special case. If this action were taken it would be much more difficult to present Canada's case before the U.S. Tariff Commission during hearings on fish products.

(g) On the other hand, not too much difficulty should be expected with the U.S. if the recent arrangements with regard to potatoes could be taken as a guide. A revision of the seasonal tariffs for many other products would have been suggested in any event and the U.S. was anticipating an approach from Canada on the whole matter.

(h) There were other products such as corn and soya beans which were suffering from severe U.S. competition right now and action should be taken to protect them too. It was pointed out, in reply, that the corn problem was related to railway freight rates. No case had yet been made for this, therefore, it was difficult to proceed as in the case of strawberries.

(i) The proposal involved a substantial extension of the principles indulging anti-dumping procedures and to reach a decision on it at this stage was not appropriate.

(j) Asking the Tariff Board to study the fresh fruit and vegetables tariff schedules would be normal if the government were considering negotiating in the G.A.T.T.. It also seemed sensible in the context of the present problem and could hardly be criticized. Against this it was argued that the proposed reference was an indication of a major change in policy which should not be settled in the present circumstances.

5. The Cabinet noted the report of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy regarding United States import competition for fresh fruit and vegetables and agreed,

(a) that there was no case at the present time for emergency protective action for apricots;

(b) that the Minister of National Revenue be authorized to fix the value for duty on imported strawberries at the following levels:

(i) 13.5 cents per pound for fresh strawberries;

(ii) 19.5 cents per pound for frozen strawberries in packages weighing 1.5 pounds and over; and,

(iii) 23.5 cents per pound for frozen strawberries in packages of under 1.5 pounds.

(c) that the Tariff Board be requested to undertake a study of the tariff schedules for fruit and vegetables; and,

(d) that an appropriate announcement be made regarding the above decisions.

(An order in council with respect to (b) above was passed accordingly; P.C. 1957-508, June 13.)

IMPORTANT

POTATOES

1. Three or four Canadian officials plan to be in Washington on Monday and Tuesday, March 5 and 6, to discuss potato tariffs and we would be grateful if you would make arrangements for meetings with appropriate U.S. officials. These could begin Monday morning but the Canadians, who will probably arrive by air on Sunday evening, would like to run over the ground with Embassy officials first. We would be grateful if you would make hotel reservations; the names of our group will follow shortly.

2. Hopper and Couillard are already generally familiar with the course of events and thinking up here, but we think it would be useful if the following explanation of the visit could be handed to U.S. officials without delay so that they may give some consideration to the matter before the meetings. You yourselves will appreciate, of course, that this explanation is to be regarded as a strong opening position in what may well develop into quite difficult negotiations.

Text begins.

For several years past Canadian potato producers have been requesting increased protection. Last year the Canadian Government decided to refer the question to the Tariff Board in order to obtain the most complete information available on production, consumption, marketing, imports and exports and also on the operation of the Canadian tariff. The Board's report was received last November and the Government has now had time to consider it and discuss it with representatives of the producers.

It seems clear that the pattern of trade in potatoes has substantially changed in recent years. Heavy imports from the United States have entailed serious injury to Canadian producers, and the tariff situation, with free entry for the great majority of imports into Canada but with a substantial U.S. tariff against Canadian exports, has become unfair and inequitable. The request of Canadian producers before the Tariff Board was that the Canadian tariff should be set at a rate of 37 1/2 cents per cwt. against all imports, even though at this level it would reciprocate the U.S. tariff applying only to shipments within the U.S. tariff quotas. The Canadian Government considers this request to be reasonable in all the circumstances.

It is recalled that, on a number of recent occasions, when the U.S. has felt impelled to take protective action in regard to certain agricultural products which had been the subject of negotiations with and tariff bindings to Canada, the Canadian Government has decided that it was not in the common interest to take compensatory action. Nevertheless, it is recognized that the present Canadian rates were negotiated between Canada and the United States as part of comprehensive trade negotiations and that they have been bound under GATT. Accordingly, Canadian officials would welcome an opportunity of discussing with U.S. officials how this matter may be handled in a mutually satisfactory manner. Ends.

SECRET [Ottawa], April 17, 1956

TARIFF ON POTATOES

During the discussions on potatoes which Canadian officials had in Washington last month, it was agreed that the U.S. authorities would provide later a definitive statement of what compensatory action the U.S. would propose in the event that Canada applied a duty of 37 1/2 cts. per cwt. to all potatoes throughout the year, as had been requested by the Canadian Horticultural Council.

2. A reply has now been received. It states that if Canada should insist on the proposal for applying a 37 1/2 ct. duty the year around, the U.S. would wish to

(a) eliminate the low-duty quota of one million bushels on table-stock potatoes,

(b) eliminate the escalator clause under which the low-duty quota on table-stock potatoes would be increased in any year in which the U.S. crop falls below 350 million bushels, and

(c) reduce the low-duty quota on seed potatoes from 2 1/2 million to 1 1/2 million bushels.

3. Canadian officials of the Departments of Agriculture, Trade and Commerce and Finance consider that to give up all of the U.S. table-stock quota (including, for what it is worth, the escalator clause) and 1,000,000 bushels of the seed quota would be too high a price to pay for a release from our present obligations. Experience in recent months shows that access to the U.S. potato market is still valuable not only for seed but also for some table stock. Officials agree, however, that it is advisable to continue efforts to negotiate more nearly reciprocal tariff arrangements on potatoes.

4. Both the formal U.S. reply and the discussions which we had in Washington indicate that the Americans will insist, as is their right, on being paid in full for whatever concessions they relinquish, and that they are particularly anxious to preserve free entry into the Canadian market for their new potatoes.

5. They have submitted counter-proposals which would involve our providing for free entry into Canada of new potatoes from January to or through July. These counter-proposals would of course not be acceptable to Canadian producers in their present form, as they would involve extending the period of free entry into or through the period (June 15-July 31) which is now dutiable. In this connection you will recall that there have been requests from early-producing areas in Ontario and British Columbia that the dutiable period commence earlier than June 15, by which date the first Canadian new potatoes are ready for market in most years. Nevertheless, the U.S. counter-proposals do suggest a possible avenue for further negotiations.

6. It is not to be taken for granted that such negotiations would produce results that would commend themselves to Canadian potato producers (who would like to have higher Canadian duties on potatoes without any change in the U.S. rates) or to the Government. However there does appear to be hope of reaching a reasonably satisfactory compromise along the following lines:

(a) the imposition by Canada of a 37 1/2 ct. duty on potatoes generally;

(b) continued free entry for new potatoes during part or all of the period January 1-June 14;

(c) the preservation of most or all of the present U.S. tariff quota on seed potatoes, and possibly part of the quota on table stock;

(d) the offer of compensation by concessions on non-sensitive vegetable items approved by the Department of Agriculture.

7. If the above course of action is adopted, critics no doubt will point to the obvious (and inevitable) fact that reciprocal rates on potatoes have not been achieved. They might also argue that looked at from the viewpoint of the consumer a luxury import (new potatoes) is exempt from a duty which applies to a staple food. And producers of early potatoes may complain that their problem has not been solved. The Government would be in a position, however, to say honestly that it had made every possible effort to meet the basic problems revealed by the producers' representations and by the Tariff Board Report.

8. Two procedural matters arise in connection with the implementation of any solution along the above lines. First, we must obtain approval from the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT to renegotiate the item in question. Second, an amendment to the Customs Tariff will have to be approved by Parliament.

9. You may wish to deal with the second matter by asking Parliament to approve at this session an amendment (to be introduced when the Budget Resolutions are in Committee) providing for the imposition of a 37 1/2 ct. per cwt. duty on potatoes imported under the British Preferential and Most-Favoured-Nation tariffs, to come into force on a date to be proclaimed by the Governor in Council. There are precedents for this procedure. It would be contemplated that if the negotiations are successful the new rates would be proclaimed on August 1, 1956, i.e. that they would maintain the seasonal duty which will be in force under the M.F.N. tariff from June 15 to July 31 under present legislation. It would be contemplated, further, that at the time the new rates are proclaimed an Order in Council would be passed under authority of Section 10 of the Customs Tariff exempting from the duty new potatoes imported during whatever period is agreed upon with the U.S. — i.e. during part or all of the period from January 1 to June 14 in each year.

10. It is recommended that officials of the Departments concerned be authorized to take the following steps:

(1) to submit to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT a formal request for permission to renegotiate Tariff Item 83(a) (potatoes);

(2) to continue negotiations in Washington looking toward an agreed solution along these lines:

(a) the imposition by Canada of a 37 1/2 ct. duty on potatoes generally;

(b) continued free entry for new potatoes during part or all of the period January 1-June 14;

(c) the preservation of most or all of the present U.S. tariff quota on seed potatoes, and, if possible, part of the quota on table stock;

(d) the offer of compensation by concessions on non-sensitive vegetable items approved by the Department of Agriculture.

11. Officials of the other Departments concerned are placing copies of this memorandum before their Ministers for concurrence or, if they so desire, for consultation with you.

POTATOES

We would be grateful if Couillard would write a letter to Thibodeaux in the following terms:

"This letter refers to the negotiations with respect to Canadian and United States tariffs on potatoes, which were attended by representatives of both our governments and concluded in Washington on April 26th. We reached a mutually acceptable basis of agreement which might be summarized as follows, by referring to changes from the existing position:

(a) Canada will impose a duty of 37 1/2 cents per cwt. on all imported potatoes with the exception that new potatoes will be granted continued free entry during the period January 1st-June 14th inclusive.

(b) The United States will reduce the tariff quota applicable to table potatoes by 500,000 bushels per year and the tariff quota applicable to seed potatoes by 500,000 bushels per year.

You will remember that our representatives enquired whether, in existing circumstances, the United States might possibly welcome a delay of several months in implementing the above agreement. You expressed interest in this suggestion and reserved your reply. We were subsequently informed that the United States would welcome deferment if it could be done without embarrassment but did not consider it sufficiently important to make a special point of requesting it.

The question of timing has now been carefully considered by the responsible Canadian ministers in the light of this reply. I am pleased to inform you that a decision has been made to defer action with respect to the potato item for several months. This decision is taken on the understanding that the substance of the agreement we have reached will not need to be re-negotiated at a later date when the time comes to formalize and implement it but will be regarded on both sides as a mutually acceptable package. It will, of course, be necessary to consult and reach agreement with regard to timing and procedures.

There is still one detail which remains incomplete and that is the wording of the new Canadian tariff item. We would like to reach an agreement with you on this in the near future so that the substantial position of the negotiations will have been completed while the issues are fresh in our minds. For this purpose, the Department of Finance will be supplying their proposed formulation for your consideration within the very near future."

POTATOES

We have received the following letter dated May 23 and signed by Ben H. Thibodeaux, Director, Office of International Trade and Resources, State Department, in reply to our letter to him of May 14, which was taken from your telegram under reference.

2. We assume you will let us know whether the State Department's reply is satisfactory. In this connection, you will note that the United States' acceptance of the "substance of the agreement" is made conditional on (1) "the views of interested parties in the United States" and (2) "unforeseen developments ... which might significantly affect the basis of agreement ... worked out".

3. Text of State Department's letter is as follows: Text begins:

"Thank you for your letter of May 14 outlining the basis for agreement which we reached in our talks on potatoes. We agree with your statement of the substance of the agreement reached between us.

"We are pleased to learn that the responsible Canadian ministers have decided to defer action on the potato tariff for several months. We should like to express the hope also that conditions by then may have improved so that the need for any action may have disappeared.

"As we made clear in our discussions with you, we shall have to obtain the views of interested parties in the United States before we would be in a position to come to any definitive agreement and understand that your position is similarly qualified. Accordingly, the agreement outlined in your letter is subject to the receipt of such views. Further, we assume that both governments would wish to reserve the right to reexamine the substance of the agreement reached should any unforseen developments occur which might significantly affect the basis of agreement which we have worked out.

"We shall be glad to see whatever formulation of the wording of the proposed new Canadian tariff item you may ultimately develop." Text ends.

Recent Developments

Recent developments have led to the conclusion that it is now desirable to go ahead with steps to provide for year-round protection for Canadian potato growers, even at the cost of a million bushels of the U.S. tariff quota. The U.S. election and the groundfish problem are out of the way; Canadian potato growers are pressing for action; and indications are that under present tariffs more potatoes would flow north than south in 1956-57. The 1956 Canadian crop is about the same size as last year, and the U.S. late-potato crop is 13 p.c. larger than last year. Moreover plantings in California and the South of early potatoes for winter and spring harvesting show a substantial increase. Accordingly preliminary steps have been taken to secure permission from the Contracting Parties to GATT to renegotiate the potato tariff as soon as possible.

Could the Package be Improved?

While last spring's package looked like the best obtainable in the circumstances, it has all along been recognized that there would be both economic and political advantages in preserving the U.S. tariff quota on seed potatoes intact if at all possible.

U.S. officials have now been sounded out informally in order to find out if it might be possible to preserve the seed quota by offering new concessions on products other than potatoes. It was found, however, that there is no basis for any such hope. We were told that if there is one thing about which U.S. potato growers would be adamant, it is involving any other commodities in negotiations relating to potatoes. If Canada is to raise her tariff on U.S. potatoes, then the payment must be made by giving up at least part of the U.S. quota on potatoes.

Our recent inquiries did reveal, however, that the U.S. Department of Agriculture is still very anxious to secure free entry into Canada for U.S. new potatoes during part or all of the present dutiable period from June 15 to July 31, inclusive. It was indicated that the U.S. might be willing to modify last spring's package if we would agree to let new potatoes come in free of duty through the month of June. Indeed, we were given reason to believe that the U.S. might be willing to reduce their tariff quotas by a total of only 1/2 million bushels rather than by 1 million bushels provided Canada would agree:

1. to extend through June 30, the period of free entry for new potatoes; and
2. to give up the escalator clause or accept its modification.

The above suggestion has been examined interdepartmentally by Canadian officials. It was agreed that the proposal should be brought to the attention of the Ministers, but its acceptance is not recommended.

Major objections to the proposal to extend the period of free entry beyond June 15 are:

(a) It has undesirable regional political implications. Ontario and British Columbia growers of early potatoes would lose part of the protection they now enjoy. They might feel that they had been sold out for the benefit of growers in other areas.

(b) The statistical evidence shows that potato imports in June are heavy (much heavier than in any other month of the year), and indicates that there might be a very sharp further increase if free entry were extended to the end of the month.

(c) Extending free entry to the end of June would aggravate the problem which to some extent already exists, of potatoes being brought in just before the duty goes on to be held in storage temporarily and then fed out gradually to potato buyers. By late June the Carolinas, Alabama and Virginia have reached the peak of their harvest and are supplying new potatoes which are relatively mature and which consequently carry better, handle better and can be stored longer than those available earlier. U.S. new potatoes and Canadian old potatoes are also usually more directly competitive price-wise during the latter part of June than earlier in the season.

POTATOES

1. The GATT Intercessional Committee has approved Canada's request for permission to renegotiate tariff item 83(a) relating to potatoes.

2. Please inform the State Department that the Canadian Government now wishes to formalize as quickly as U.S. procedures will permit an agreement regarding potatoes on the basis which was mutually accepted by U.S. and Canadian negotiators in Washington on April 26, 1956. The substance of this agreement was confirmed by your letter of May 14, 1956 to Mr. Thibodeaux and his reply dated May 23, 1956.

3. You will recall that it was agreed that the U.S. tariff quotas on potatoes would be reduced by a total of one million bushels, and it was left to Canada to decide how this amount would be apportioned between seed and table stock potatoes. At that time we suggested that each quota be reduced by 500,000 bushels, but we retained the option of reapportioning the reduction. After further consideration we should now like to propose that 60 p.c. of the reduction apply to seed and 40 p.c. to table stock, i.e. that the seed quota be reduced from 2 1/2 million to 1.9 million bushels and the table stock quota from one million to 600,000 bushels. Would you please enquire if this apportionment of the agreed total reduction is satisfactory to the U.S.

4. We understand that the U.S. Government will wish to give public notice of its intention to renegotiate the reciprocal commitment on potatoes and to allow 30 days for the submission of views and a further 7 days for the consideration of submissions before concluding a formal agreement.

5. Please confirm or correct the above time-table, and let us know on what date the U.S. notice of intention to renegotiate potatoes will be issued. We would appreciate receiving the text of the U.S. announcement in advance if possible.

POTATOES

Weiss has now given us their considered reply, which you will probably not find too helpful.

2. He points out that, in accordance with their established procedures here, they would not be in a position to make anything public until after presidential approval of the proposed changes in the tariff has been secured. They will not be able to request such approval until the public hearings have been completed and the results assessed.

3. Moreover, Weiss understands that, even if the package proposal still seems acceptable after the public hearings, there will have to be clearance with the Cubans on one of the rates involved (Weiss thought the Cuban concession related to table stock and involved both the rate of duty and the margin of preference). This might require some delay beyond that entailed in the ordinary USA procedures.

4. If, of course, something unforeseen emerges from the hearings and the package deal has to be reexamined with you, this might also delay matters.

5. It would therefore appear that, whether the package proposal stands or has to be altered, there may be more delay than either you or the State Department would wish in determining the final USA position or at least in making it public.

6. Weiss regretted that it was not possible to be more definite and hoped that you would appreciate their situation.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 15, 1957

Dear Mr. Isbister:

POTATOES

As you know, the United States Administration is now considering the representations made to their Committee on Reciprocity Information relating to potato tariffs.

We have heard rumours from Washington that the U.S. Administration may wish to re-open the "package deal" which was accepted last May (subject to unforeseen circumstances) when our group was down there. These rumours may be to some extent confirmed by the extreme reluctance which the United States Administration has shown during the past couple of months to give us any information on how quickly they can deal with the matter once the Committee has received its evidence and held its hearings.

Up to the present we have simply been pressing the United States to confirm the package deal as quickly as possible. However, it may be as well to take one more look at this package in the light of what emerged in the Committee.

You will already have seen the summary of this material which was prepared by our Embassy in Washington and contained in Telegram 579 of March 12.† However, for your convenience I attach another copy.

Earlier this week I had a visit from Mr. Les Burrows. He had been in Washington for several days and attended the public sessions of the Committee and read some of the submissions. He emphasized that, as far as he could find, practically nobody in Washington really wanted to cut the Canadian tariff quotas on table stock and seed. I would now gather from reading the Embassy summary that almost all the briefs were preoccupied with trying to head off the possibility of tariff adjustment up here and accordingly did not address themselves to the question of what compensation should be demanded in the event that we decided to go ahead. I have called this point to Mr. Burrows' attention.

Would you let me know whether, all things considered, you remain satisfied to press for acceptance of the agreed package or whether you would like to suggest any changes. I am sending copies of this letter to the other Departments concerned and would be glad to have their views also. If it turns out that anyone wishes to suggest changes, then I think we might have another potato party. Perhaps you would like to act as host on this occasion!

Yours sincerely,

POTATOES

This will confirm conclusions of interdepartmental meeting of officials as already telephoned to Ritchie from Plumptre.

2. The question of timing, emerging from your telegram under reference has been discussed with Mr. Harris. He must make a statement in the House before it prorogues and accordingly the statement must be given by the middle of the week after next; i.e., April third or fourth at latest. This, it seems, is our ultimate deadline.

3. There are three possibilities regarding the statement to be made in Parliament:

(a) a joint announcement in both countries of the "agreed package";

(b) the device originally planned for the budget raising the statutory duty but reducing it by Order in Council pending completion of negotiations; and

(c) unilateral Canadian action.

4. The views of officials here on these three possibilities are as follows:

(a) The adoption of possibility (a) would be by far the most desirable from every point of view. The new situation would be revealed as a whole, thus avoiding the danger of misunderstanding and disappointment from piecemeal introduction. Moreover it would maintain the tradition of Canada-US orderly handling of joint questions in the trade field.

(b) With regard to (b) we think that it is probably no longer practicable to announce further delay. The potato market, with which we are closely in touch, has been deteriorating. Prices have broken in the west and are weakening in the east.

(c) Thus, failing a joint announcement of the agreed package, we would be driven to an announcement of immediate unilateral action. This action would comprise 37 1/2¢ across the board but with free entry of new potatoes January first to June fourteenth. While this step would be, in form, unilateral, we would hope to cooperate with the US authorities to the fullest extent possible. In particular we would invite their comments on the proposed announcement and would hope to introduce in the announcement the flavour that, while a large measure of agreement had been reached, the exigencies of the legal and constitutional position on the two sides of the border made simultaneous action impossible. We would also hope, of course, to get maximum possible assurances that when the US side did act it would be in line with the package agreement.

5. In regard to GATT provisions, if we can adopt course (a) a joint notification to the Secretariat is required and we shall be sending you a draft† shortly. If we are driven to course (c) we would prefer, and we believe the US would also prefer, to continue to consider that we are acting under Article XXVIII, with an unfortunate inability to act precisely in unison. However, in the event (which we consider unlikely) that the US or other CP's challenged this position we will be prepared with a case under Article XIX. This is being prepared.

6. We feel sure that the US authorities will recognize that our need for urgent action is not based merely on political developments here. It is now a year since we explained to them in great detail why the government considered this to be a special problem requiring special action. Subsequently full and friendly agreement was reached on the nature of the action to be taken. This action has already been delayed longer than anyone would have anticipated at that time, and we have at last run up against our ultimate deadline.

7. There is one point on which we are not absolutely clear because the US has been keeping us rather at arms length recently. One million bushels was to be taken off the seed and table quotas, the distribution to be decided by us. While we originally talked of taking half a million off each, we later proposed six hundred thousand off seed and four hundred thousand off table. We are assuming that these latter figures are in the US mill at present. Can you confirm this?

8. We should remind you that this matter is a budget item and should be protected accordingly.

POTATOES

During the conversation on other matters yesterday afternoon with Dr. Hauge of the President's Executive Office, we indicated how important and urgent the potato issue had become in Ottawa. He was not at that time very familiar with the stage which consideration of the matter in the USA administration had reached. On checking with his assistant he ascertained that paper for signature by the President was "moving in his direction". We expressed the hope that it might be acted upon as quickly as possible.

2. This morning after a phone call from Plumptre, we spoke again with Dr. Hauge, when he was free from a meeting which he was having with the President on another subject. Later this afternoon he called back to say that he had now considered the paper and had sent it forward to Governor Adams for the President's attention. The President was away from his office at that time. Although Hauge could not give us an absolutely firm guarantee that the President would complete action before noon tomorrow, he indicated as his own judgment that the chances were good for action this evening or tomorrow morning.

3. In the light of this report, we checked again with the State Department officials who had been going over their timetable as a result of an enquiry made by us this morning. They have informed us that if presidential approval is secured by some time around mid-day tomorrow, they consider the chances for completion of the whole operation by Tuesday noon to be "pretty good". You can be sure that we shall keep after them as soon as we hear that action has been taken at the White House.

4. We shall endeavour to give you tomorrow the changes proposed by the USA in the joint notification document. Incidentally, since the issuance of a public announcement on Tuesday would have to be preceded by the signature of this agreement, possibly a day or two beforehand, we assume that you will give us the necessary authority to do the signing.

5. Postscript: Dr. Hauge has proven to be as good as his word. Shortly before six o'clock he phoned to say that a quarter of an hour previously the President had signed the necessary document. It now only remains for the other formalities to be completed prior to publication.[136] You may nevertheless wish to have the above chronology of the exchanges on this subject during the day for your records.

STATE LEGISLATION AFFECTING THE MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF BEER

Mr. E.P. Taylor, Chairman of the Board of Carling Brewing Company Inc. (a Virginia company 99% owned by Canadian Breweries Ltd) accompanied by Mr. Ian R. Dowie, President of this company, and several advisers called on the Minister March 6 to discuss the legislative attempts being made in several states to discriminate against brewing companies in which the controlling interest is held by persons not citizens of the United States.

2. They outlined the history of this company since Canadian Breweries Ltd. gained control of it and altered its name from Brewing Corporation of America. Sales had increased from 300,000 barrels to 3 million barrels. It was now providing 4% of total United States production; it was the eighth largest producer and still advancing. Mr. Taylor said this progress was a result of the application of modern methods, and was not fostered by unfair practices.

3. Mr. Taylor said that the real reasons why Carling was unpopular with the other U.S. breweries were this steady growth and the fact that while not indulging in price-cutting, the company refused to participate in price-fixing arrangements. Two other reasons were also cited, the high Canadian tariff on United States beer, and the unwillingness of the provincial liquor boards to list it. These in Mr. Taylor's opinion were "red herrings". The United States industry was not really interested in exporting to Canada.

4. Mr. Taylor believed that a plot to encourage discriminatory legislation in individual states had been hatched at a meeting of the United States Brewers' Foundation in January. In Maryland a bill had now been passed by both Houses which would prohibit Carling from establishing a brewery there. It was still possible that the Governor would veto the bill. The press and most public bodies were opposed to the bill.

5. Bills had been introduced in New York and Pennsylvania which would effectively prohibit the import into these states of Carling's products produced in other states. (The 21st Amendment of the U.S. Constitution has apparently been interpreted so as to leave any state free to regulate the trade in beer and liquor as it sees fit, even where inter-state commerce is concerned). A bill had also been introduced in New York designed to prohibit the issuance of a brewer's license to Carling. Although all these bills were drafted in general terms they were in his opinion intended to apply solely to Carling, which was the only brewery that could be affected.

6. Mr. Taylor said the Carling Brewing Company was doing what it could to discourage these activities. It was employing registered lobbyists and the best counsel, and was even considering taking civil action against the other brewers under the anti-trust laws. He believed, however, that it would be helpful if the Canadian government were to express some concern to the United States authorities. There was a danger that these state activities would set a precedent that might be applied to distilling and other industries.

7. Mr. Pearson pointed out that our interest would be in the protection of Canadian investors as such, not the protection of a United States company. The situation was complicated by the fact that the complaints concerned state rather than federal acts, and we had to consider what position we might be in if faced with representations from the U.S. government with regard to such matters as provincial liquor regulations or practices. He indicated that we could however make enquiries in Washington on the basis of reports in the press. These enquiries might stimulate some interest in Washington in the principles involved. We would also consider whether it would be wise to make informal representations to the United States authorities. We certainly shared Mr. Taylor's view that the example set by legislation of this kind could have serious consequences.

8. Mr. Taylor appeared to be satisfied with this. He undertook to send us a brief on the whole subject.

RESTRICTIONS ON THE SALE OF BEER — STATE LEGISLATURES

The New York Consulate General has provided us with some specific information concerning the legislation that has been introduced into the state legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania.

2. From this information it seems almost certain that legislation in neither House would actually affect imports from Canada or other countries. The wording is to the effect that no person holding a license shall transport or import into the state in question any beer that is brewed by a corporation licensed by another state that is not 51 percent owned by US citizens, or (in the case of New York) citizens of a country having treaty of reciprocity with the United States.

3. It is not absolutely clear from the wording of the bills if the word "state" definitely confines the restriction to a state of the union. However, there seems to be little doubt that the intent of the legislation is not aimed at imports from outside of the US.

4. In the State of New York two bills have been introduced by Senator Van Lare, Nos. 3236 and 3237. The latter is the bill providing for the restriction on "transportation and importation" into New York State and the former is similar to the Maryland legislation, and requires 51 percent US ownership of any brewery established in the State of New York. Both bills were introduced into the State Legislature on the 21st of February. No. 3237 was read before the Senate and sent to the Committee on Excise. No. 3236 may not yet have been formally introduced into the Senate, but we have no precise information on it.

5. The Bill for Pennsylvania is HB 2026, and was introduced on the 21st of February by Senator Readinger and Assemblyman Smith to the General Assembly. This bill has also been sent to committee and there has been no action on it up to the present time.

6. The New York Consulate General advised that it is the general opinion that neither the New York nor the Pennsylvania bill is likely to be acted upon during the current sessions. This generally hopeful forecast is also supported by the State Department officials who are watching these cases.

7. In regard to the Maryland situation, the Governor is holding conferences on Wednesday and Thursday, with both the proponents and opponents of the legislation. There is no further indication as to what action the Governor is likely to take but presumably he will not reach his decision until he has considered whatever the two sides have to say to him during the conferences.

8. In the meantime, the Baltimore Sun, and also the Washington Post have been carrying both editorials and news articles that are most critical of the legislation. However, the Baltimore Sun also carried a long letter from the Secretary-Treasurer of the Associated Breweries Incorporated, of Baltimore, defending the bill. In addition, in the Saturday issue of the Baltimore Sun the associated breweries carried a full page advertisement of an open letter to the citizens of Maryland that is designed to show the facts that lead up to the introduction of the bill in that state. This open letter is based on the investigation carried out by the Canadian restrictive trade practices [group corrupt] Breweries Limited, which is designed to support their contention that the associated breweries are endeavouring to keep out of the State of Maryland a corporation that has monopolistic tendencies. They quote at length from the Commission's report, showing how the acquisition of breweries in Ontario resulted in the closing down of these operations. The letter also refers to the recommendations by the Commission that the Department of Justice should prevent Canadian breweries from expanding further by the acquisition of the assets or the controlling interests in the capital stock of any of its remaining competitors in Canada.

9. They also repeat the criticism against the provincial Liquor Commission's refusal to buy American been under the general title of "Canadians ban US beer."

10. We are sending you in the mail a copy of the Associated Breweries Inc.'s letter to the Baltimore Sun, since this letter does carry a number of points that illustrate certain weaknesses in our position. These weaknesses are referred to in paragraph 3 of your E-445. In commenting on the claim that such a bill would be contrary to the furtherance of international goodwill, and would be an unfriendly action towards Canada, the letter points out that "Pennsylvania and Alabama have for many years provided the corporations owning breweries must be at least 51 percent owned and controlled by United States citizens." The letter goes on to point out that no international crises have resulted from this situation and wonders, in effect, why so much fuss is being made over the Maryland Bill.

11. The letter also points to the fact that the Province of Quebec has consistently refused to issue import licenses to any American brewer and quotes the provincial Liquor Control Commissioner as having stated that "There is no need to import beer since Canadian breweries have ample production."

12. We would agree with Mr. Taylor where he states that these are red herrings. Nevertheless, they do provide grounds for complaint on behalf of American breweries. We are convinced that as long as these herrings are allowed to remain in our cupboard we will always be in a difficult position when trying to argue against discriminatory legislation such as illustrated in these state bills. In time, even red herrings tend to become odoriferous unless they are dealt with, and we believe that in our overall interests if there is anything that can be done to persuade the liquor commissions, particularly in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, to have a trial run with American beer, it would pay off in the long run.

13. We are, of course, aware of the fact that the Ontario Liquor Commission's defence is that they have had American beer in the past and that they could not move it. This may well be so, but we also understand that this was an experiment carried out some years ago when exports of Canadian beer to the United States were not anything like as large as they are now.

14. It seems to be generally admitted that there is nothing unconstitutional about any of these bills, since under the Twenty-Fifth Amendment the sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages is clearly established as the prerogative of the governments of the different states. While similar bills that did not deal with alcoholic beverages could be ruled as unconstitutional, in the case of alcoholic beverages the states have the right to do as they please.

15. Even if nothing comes of the bills that have been introduced into the States of New York and Pennsylvania, and if the Governor of the State of Maryland vetoes the bill under discussion, we believe that imports of beer from Canada, and the operation of Carlings in the US will be continually under attack until we can dispose of the red herrings. Since the disposing of the red herrings seems neither to be unreasonable nor to promise any serious effect on the sale of Canadian beer in Canada, we should think that it would be very much to our overall advantage for the Liquor Commissions in Quebec and Ontario to call the bluff of the American breweries by agreeing to purchase some beer in order to test the implications that it can be sold in Canada.

RESTRICTIONS ON THE SALE OF BEER — STATE LEGISLATURES

1. The Governor of Maryland has still not given any signs as to the action that he proposes taking in the bill under consideration. However, a few days ago, nine members of Congress from the States of New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Michigan and New Jersey sent a complaint to the State Department accusing it of unwarranted "encroachment" on the efforts by Maryland to keep out a Canadian brewery. The State Department was apparently accused of using its "power and prestige" in behalf of a Canadian monopoly which is bending every effort to prevail upon the Governor of a State to veto a bill passed by an overwhelming majority in both Houses of its General Assembly.

2. Evidently this letter from the Members of Congress has struck a sensitive nerve in the State Department. We were told privately a few days ago that the State Department would be calling upon us within a few days in order to present to the Canadian Embassy United States views concerning the way in which the provinces in Canada hinder the legitimate importation and sale of American beer. They said they would like us to know in advance that this sort of approach would be made to us so that we would be in a position to comment on the situation when they saw us.

3. We have just now been asked if we would go to the State Department at 2.30 on March 21st in order to discuss this question. If you have any particular views that you would like us to put forward to the State Department when they make their "complaint", we would be glad to receive them before that date.

4. We think that we are capable of meeting any complaint the State Department can make to us. We would propose to first of all suggest that there are no grounds for tying in state legislation designed to restrict capital investment with the problem of imports. We would then go on to point out that, as the State Department well knows, the importation and sale of beer in Canada is entirely the prerogative of the provinces. However, this is a problem that has been discussed with the provinces on several occasions and in the case of Ontario they have pointed out that they have on occasions bought certain quantities of United States beer but they could not sell it within a reasonable time. In other words, there did not appear at that time to be any large demand for American beer in Canada, either from Canadians or from United States tourists.

5. If the State Department refers to the question of the higher duty on Canadian beer, we would first point out that we do not accept the argument that there are any grounds for equalization of duties on any one particular article between countries. For example, the Canadian duty on United States whisky is lower than the United States duty on Canadian whisky. We would then point out that we understand that the United States negotiators propose to ask us to lower the duty on beer during the current negotiations at Geneva. Presumably, this item will be negotiated and we may express the hope that a satisfactory agreement would be reached on the duty on Canadian beer.

6. We would, of course, agree to accept any statement that they would wish to give us in relation to this problem on the sale of beer in Canada and forward it to you.

SALE OF US BEER IN CANADA

As advised in the message under reference, we had a fairly long discussion with the State Department yesterday afternoon. We were pleased that the State Department opened the discussion by deliberately disassociating the question of imports of American beer into Canada from the proposals in the Maryland legislature to prohibit the establishment of a brewery in that state that is not 51 percent American owned. They emphasized that, regardless of what we could or could not do in relation to the problem of importing American beer into Canada, the State Department would continue to oppose vigorously any legislation of the type that has just been vetoed in Maryland, or that has been proposed in the States of Pennsylvania and New York to limit the sale of beer by foreign owned breweries in the US.

2. Evidently the State Department officials had a long meeting with the nine members of Congress who addressed the letter to the State Department (which we referred to in paragraph one of our [telegram] under reference), together with representatives of American brewing interests. At that meeting the question of restriction on capital investment in the US and the so called restrictions on imports of beer into Canada were linked up by the representatives and by members of the trade. Nevertheless, the State Department made it clear to us that they had emphasized the fact that the two subjects must be unrelated and dealt with separately. In wishing to talk to us about the "plight" of American beer in Canada, they thought that they had been somewhat remiss in not having informally brought up this question before they had become embroiled with the State of Maryland over the Carlings position.

3. The arguments put forward by the American brewing interests, and repeated to us by the State Department, were along familiar lines. The State Department, of course, is well aware of the fact that the sale and importation of beer in Canada is the prerogative of the provinces, although they were not fully informed concerning the restrictions on the retail sale of beer in Canada. They wondered to what extent it is true that the real problem concerning the sale of American beer in Canada is that Canadians do not like American beer. They thought that perhaps this might be an excuse for preventing free competition. However, we drew their attention to the fact that the Liquor Commission of Ontario, specifically, had at times imported American beer but had found it difficult to move and consequently were in a position to claim that it was not an article that had ready sale and therefore, for purely commercial reasons, they did not wish to repeat the experiment. On the other hand, the publicized statement by the Quebec Liquor Commission, to the effect that since Quebec had adequate supplies of domestic beers they did not need to import beer from the US, suggests to the State Department that the principal argument in defence of the Canadian position may not be wholly supported by the facts.

4. The State Department also asked us whether we thought that perhaps the reason the beer had not been sold readily in Ontario was that it had been offered for sale at too high a price, either as a result of higher customs duties, or because of higher mark-ups in the Liquor Commission. In answer to this argument, we pointed to the fact that Canadian beer sells in the US at prices considerably above domestic beer and that, in spite of this, it is still sought after by Canadian tourists coming to the US, which is supported by the fact that the consumption of Canadian beer along the border seems to increase materially on Canadian holidays which do not coincide with US holidays. We agreed, however, that the real question was not whether or not American beer would or would not be popular in Canada, but whether the Liquor Commissioners were in fact making it possible to give the Canadian thesis a thorough-going test.

5. During the meeting of the State Department officials with the brewery officials, a representative for Budweiser made the claim that they had been trying to establish a brewery in Canada for some twenty years but that they had been effectively prevented from doing so. In passing this information to us the State Department emphasized that they did not wish us to take any cognizance of that particular claim since they admitted that they had not been able to obtain any evidence to support the claim, nor could they indicate in what way Budweiser had been prevented from carrying out their plans. They mentioned it, however, because they are looking into the claim by Budweiser and if they can obtain any facts from them they might be in touch with us again on that particular aspect of the problem.

6. We informed the State Department that we would be glad to forward their comments to you and we were confident you would take them under advisement and consider what action could be taken to help in settling this unfortunate dispute.

7. We drew the conclusion that the State Department were, in fact, appealing to us to try to give them some ammunition with which they could effectively continue to challenge the various moves in the different states that tended to restrict the free development of Canadian capital investment in this country, or to in any way interfere with the legitimate importation of beer from Canada. It seems clear that they were put under very strong pressure from the politicians and from the industry. It will probably be difficult for them to continue to back up our position unless they can show that the real difficulty in selling American beer in Canada lies in the fact that American beer is not really a saleable product.

8. The State Department will be expecting to hear further from us as to what action, if any, you are able to take. As mentioned in our message 488, of the 15th of March, we believe that it would be in our own interests if the Liquor Commissions would undertake to make a test with small shipments of US beer. We do appreciate that you are in a difficult position vis-à-vis the provinces, in the same way the State Department was faced with a difficult problem in making representation to the State of Maryland. However, if nothing is done by the Liquor Commissions we will have to accept the possibility that ways will be found to restrict unfettered imports of beer from Canada or to seriously interfere with the operations of Carlings in the US. We do appreciate that the Liquor Commissions cannot be expected to stock products for which there is no sale, but the financial risk involved by experimental purchases (it might even be that the US breweries would be prepared to ship on consignment) would be relatively small and in our view a small price to pay to insure the future stability or expansion for a valuable market for a Canadian product or for a healthy climate in which a Canadian capital investment may flourish.

CANADIAN RESTRICTIONS ON BEER

1. On June 12, we were called to the State Department to discuss with them what we had been able to do to persuade the Liquor Commissioners to at least undertake token purchases of USA beer. Before going to the State Department, in the lack of any instructions from you as to what we should say, we were able to discuss the question with Maurice Schwarzmann, Department of Trade and Commerce.

2. While we thought that our position vis-à-vis the State Department was relatively weak inasmuch as we could not give them any assurance that we had directly approached the Liquor Commissioners, particularly of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, we believe that we were successful in satisfying the State Department that we had in fact done a considerable amount of useful propaganda that it is hoped will produce desired results.

3. Before indicating to the State Department what had been done on this question, we asked if they could first of all advise us whether or not the present enquiry had resulted from further pressures from the brewing interests in the USA and specifically if the enquiry was related to the reduction in duty given to the USA in the recently concluded GATT negotiations.

4. The State Department were very frank in telling us that they had just completed a meeting with the USA Brewers Association in which that Association had complimented the State Department on their success in obtaining such a satisfactory reduction in Canadian duties but went on to emphasize that this reduction, without a change of heart on behalf of the various Canadian Liquor Commissioners, was of no use to them whatsoever. Although we have not seen it, the same Association issued a press release reflecting these ideas.† The Association evidently then asked the State Department if they could report what success they had had in their approach to us and it was principally because of that meeting that the State Department wanted to know what we had done to help remove the reluctance of the Liquor Commissioners to give American beer a chance in the Canadian market.

5. The State Department went on to say that, in their opinion, the situation was becoming particularly embarrassing. In addition to this meeting with the Brewers Association, the Detroit Board of Commerce has written a letter to the President urging him to take up this question direct with Mr. St. Laurent.† The State Department are particularly concerned with this approach of the Detroit Board of Commerce because that board has been one of the most consistent and foremost supporters of the President's liberal foreign economic policy. It was that body that lobbied for the successful amendment to the customs law which enabled USA iron and steel manufactures to be further processed in Canada and returned for finishing to the USA on the payment of duty only on the cost of further processing. This, we understand, has resulted in a useful and expanding measure of business particularly in the Detroit area. Because of the support for this liberal trading policy by the Detroit Board of Commerce, particularly in relation to trade with Canada, the State Department evidently believe that this direct approach to the President will carry a more than usual amount of weight. They would clearly wish to be able to advise the President that the Canadian Government has taken active steps to correct this situation and so avoid the necessity of the President having to deal positively with this relatively unimportant matter.

6. In addition they told us, for our own information which should not be passed on to the Canadian brewers, that the beer lobby in Maryland is believed to feel confident that they have mobilized sufficient support in the Maryland legislature to override the Governor's veto of the beer legislation next January.

7. In discussing with the State Department what action the Canadian Government had been able to take, we emphasized that we had made it known to the Canadian brewing interests the danger that is entailed by the continued refusal of the Liquor Commissioners to stock even a small quantity of American beer. Moreover, we were confident that, although we had not ourselves directly approached the Liquor Commissioners on this subject, they have been fully appraised of the situation and we were hopeful that they would now favourably consider the possibility of making some purchases of beer. We went on to point out that even if we had approached the Liquor Commissioners directly we could not have expected them to give us any actual assurance that they would buy American beer since the Liquor Commissions are autonomous bodies and operated as commercial organizations. The question of what stocks they should carry was decided on normal commercial considerations (principally whether or not there would be a demand for the products that would be offered for sale).

8. We further stated that now that the duty had been reduced from 50 cents to 15 cents, it seemed apparent to us that USA brewers would be in a relatively strong position in approaching the Liquor Commissioners at this time to point out that they could not longer claim without reservation that there is no demand for American beer in Canada since the beer could now be offered at a price which was below the level at which it was formerly offered for sale when it was claimed that there was no sale for it. The State Department asked us if we thought the Liquor Commissioners would be open to accept consignments of beer in the event that any USA brewery would be interested in trying to break into the market on that basis.

9. We were unable to give any firm answer to this question but suggested that it would be one useful method to be adopted by the brewers as evidence of their conviction that their beer would find some measure of demand in Canada.

10. We further pointed out that we were confident that now that the duty on foreign beer had been satisfactorily reduced, the Liquor Commissioners would be under pressure from German, Danish and Dutch beer exporters to stock their products. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance that the American brewers should be advised to immediately attempt to sell their beer to the Liquor Commissioners. If it was found that they received an entirely negative reply from these commissioners, we then urged the State Department that they should inform us of the fact when we would be pleased to examine the situation and see what further steps could be taken to help.

11. We also advised the State Department of the fact that we were studying what could be done to reciprocate the arrangement for the posting of bond on the import of returnable bottles. We were careful, however, to point out that we were unable to promise that we would be able to do anything in that particular line, but at least we were giving sympathetic consideration to the possibilities.

12. Domestic brewers had evidently suggested to the State Department that advertising in Canada by foreign brewers was prohibited in Ontario and Quebec. We, of course, pointed out that the rules for advertising were the same whether or not the brewery was Canadian or of foreign origin so that there was no unfair advantage on that score than was available to Canadian companies.

13. It was pointed out previously that we believe the State Department were entirely satisfied with the efforts that had been made on their behalf. They agreed that they would immediately inform the USA breweries that they should approach the Liquor Commissioners with offers of beer and they readily agreed to keep us informed if the result of this approach proved to be negative.

GROUNDFISH FILLETS; TARIFF COMMISSION REPORT

Today the Tariff Commission released its escape clause report on groundfish fillets. The Commission unanimously found that as a result in part of the customs treatment reflecting the concession granted in GATT on January 1, 1948, groundfish fillets are being imported into the USA in such increased quantities, both actual and relative, as to cause serious injury to the domestic industry. The Commission recommends that the duty on the imports that enter under tariff quota be increased from 1 7/8 cent per pound to 2.8125 cents per pound and that the duty on imports that enter in excess of the quota be increased from 2 1/2 cents per pound to 3.75 cents per pound.

2. I assume that you will be instructing me to submit a note couched in the strongest terms to the USA Government protesting against this increase in duty on imports of groundfish fillets and that this be done at the earliest possible time.

3. As you know, the President is permitted by law to withhold his decision for 60 days. However, due to political pressures that may be brought to bear before the election, it is quite possible that he may be induced to make his decision at a very early date. So we may not have much time to get our protest in.

4. To make sure that the importance to Canada of this decision is brought home to the White House, I would propose, after presenting the note, to call personally on Gabriel Hauge, the President's principal adviser in these matters, so as to give all the emphasis we can to the serious effect that the implementation of these recommendations would have on our commercial relations.

GROUNDFISH FILLETS; REPORT OF THE U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION

On Friday evening, October 12th, Mr. Ritchie telephoned me from Ottawa to say that it was expected that Mr. Howe would wish to speak that evening to Governor Adams to impress upon the White House the gravity with which the Government had learned of the recommendation of the U.S. Tariff Commission made public earlier that day. I said that meantime I would speak to Adams myself and emphasize how important it was for us that the President should not act upon the Commission's recommendation until we had had an opportunity of putting the Canadian case.

2. Later that evening I got in touch with Adams. He said he would be glad to talk to Mr. Howe when he called. The following morning, October 13th, Adams telephoned me to say that Mr. Howe had not yet reached him but that he had looked into the question and that I could assure Mr. Howe:

(a) That the President would not make a decision on the commission's recommendation for some while (I took this to mean until after the U.S. Election).

(b) That there would be no precipitate decision made and what we would have plenty of time to present our views to the U.S. authorities.

(c) That when we did submit our case we could be certain that it would receive sympathetic consideration.

3. Later the same morning, October 13th, Adams telephoned again to say that Mr. Howe had reached him and that he had given the same responses which he had communicated to me earlier. When I spoke to Ritchie that evening, he said that Adams was reported to have been more categorical with Mr. Howe in stating that the President would not act until after the Election. I recommend to Ritchie that, despite our success in having action deferred, our note of protest should not be delayed but put in to the State Department early the following week. I also said that after presentation of the note I would consult Adams and arrange to see him and/or Hauge, as I believe that the White House and not the State Department would have the principal influence in advising the President.

U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON GROUNDFISH FILLETS

On Sunday Mr. St. Laurent apparently had lunch with Mr. Donald[137] Gordon, who mentioned to him a conversation which Mr. Gordon had had with Mr. Bull about developments relating to the tariff on this commodity. After his return to Ottawa on Monday Mr. St. Laurent called Mr. Bull and enquired about the current situation. Mr. Bull told him briefly that Mr. Howe had telephoned Mr. Sherman Adams and that Mr. Heeney had also had talks with Mr. Adams. Mr. Bull also mentioned that it was intended to submit a note to the State Department for the record.

2. Mr. St. Laurent was quite concerned about the possibility of some action being taken by the United States and suggested that he himself might also telephone Governor Adams, whom he knew quite well from earlier days. He thought he might do this without showing any awareness of the earlier conversations which others have had with Mr. Adams. He would mention to Mr. Adams that he had just returned to town and that he wanted to let him know how great his anxiety was about the possibility of action being taken which would have most upsetting effects in Canada. According to Mr. Bryce the Prime Minister did call Mr. Adams late on Monday and Mr. Adams confirmed the points he had made to Mr. Howe. He said he had told Mr. Howe this problem could be taken out of our "worry book". He had also assured Mr. Howe that no decision would be taken for a considerable time and that we would be given ample opportunity to express our views which would in turn be considered very sympathetically.

3. Mr. St. Laurent told Mr. Bryce that the conversation was very friendly in tone and that he was reassured by Mr. Adams' remarks.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS ON GROUNDFISH FILLETS

In the light of the various conversations over the past weekend and of the messages received from you we would now propose that you should present a note to the State Department as soon as possible. We agree with your suggestion that this note should also be drawn to the attention of the White House. The following is the text which you might submit: Text begins.

The Canadian Ambassador presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honour to refer to the report of the United States Tariff Commission on groundfish fillets which was made public on October 12. The Canadian Government has noted with concern the recommendation that import duties applicable to these products should be substantially increased.

The catching and processing of groundfish are major sources of livelihood in the Atlantic provinces of Canada. Four-fifths of the output of the Canadian fillet industry are sold in the United States. The return to Canadian producers is, therefore, materially affected by the level of the United States tariff, and serious damage would be done if the recommendations of the Commission were to be implemented. Quite aside from trade, one of the unfortunate consequences would be that Canadians would regard such measures on the part of the United States as contrary to the underlying purposes of efforts which have been made to deal with complex problems in the North American fisheries through co-operative joint measures.

In successive trade agreements between Canada and the United States, the United States tariff on groundfish fillets has occupied a position of central importance. The United States Government has undertaken to extend tariff concessions to Canada on these tariff rates and Canada has paid in full for these concessions within the framework of balanced negotiations. If the United States tariff on groundfish fillets were to be increased, thus seriously affecting the balance within the trade agreement, there would be a strong reaction across Canada, and particularly in the Atlantic provinces where many groups would be directly or indirectly affected. Moreover, this is such an important item in the trade agreement that if it were to be altered in this manner, businessmen in both countries would not then be able to feel confident about their future status under other provisions of the agreement.

In recent years, the Canadian Government has on several occasions stated its views to the United States Government on this same subject when comparable issues were involved.[138] The Canadian Government would wish to draw attention to such past statements as amplifying its present views. Nothing in this note should be taken to affect the rights or obligations of the respective governments under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with respect to this matter not to constitute proceedings under that Agreement.

In the light of the foregoing considerations, the Canadian Government confidently hopes and believes that the President will not take the action recommended by the Commission. Ends.[139]

PETROLEUM IMPORTS INTO THE USA

When I saw the Under Secretary of State this morning concerning the Tariff Commission's recommendations on groundfish fillets, he said when we had finished our discussion on that subject that he "would now like to turn to something more pleasant".

2. Hoover then went on to tell me how pleased he was that it had now been agreed between the USA Government and the petroleum industry that Canadian oil would be regarded as on all fours with domestic production in the USA. That was to say, he went on, that Canadian oil would not be included in the restrictive schemes worked out between the Office of Defence Mobilization and the representatives of the USA industry. We would, he thought, hear no more of the argument, in regard to oil, that a Canadian supply could not be relied on in the event of a national emergency. This, he believed, was a great advance and one which we would welcome.

3. A couple of weeks ago Chappell had learned from Stewart, Director of Oil and Gas, Department of Interior, that the task force of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy were making recommendations to this effect to the Cabinet committee (of which Hoover is Chairman). Stewart told Chappell that the task force's recommendation did not make similar exemptions for Venezuela or for any other country, and went on to observe that when the new formula and the Canadian exemption were made public the trans-mountain pipeline might consider a further increase in capacity.

4. The above info is, of course, directly relevant to the demand of the domestic oil industry for a hearing by the Director of Defence Mobilization under Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act regarding petroleum imports.

DESPATCH NO. 1709 Washington, November 29, 1956

U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATION ON THE IMPORT OF GROUNDFISH FILLETS

On the afternoon of November 21st Smith and Gilbert saw Gabriel Hauge, Special Assistant to the President, at which time the Tariff Commission's recommendation on the raising of the duty on imports of groundfish was discussed.

2. In opening the conversation Smith emphasized the serious consequences, both politically and economically, to Canadian trade of any increase in duty on exports of groundfish to the U.S.

3. Hauge seemed interested in an account of Gilbert's recent tour of Boston and Gloucester in which he said that a unanimous opinion was not even held by the processers concerning the Tariff Commission's recommendation. There were those who totally opposed it and there were those like Fritz Bundy of Gorton-Pew's who felt that an increase in the duty could be charged against the final price of fish to the consumer. It was pointed out that this was a fact which was not firmly established and the Canadians feared that the increase would have to be absorbed in part, if not wholly, by the Canadian processors and fishermen.

4. Hauge admitted he had had several visits from those who had been responsible for the application to the Tariff Commission for a hearing and in these interviews they had tried to impress upon him the fact that the reason given by the President for not accepting the Tariff Commission's recommendation in 1953 that the new fish stick industry would possibly solve the problems facing the industry, had not turned out to be true. He also reminded us that this time the Tariff Commission's recommendation was unanimous whereas in 1953 it was a 4 to 2 decision (in fact it was 3 to 2). He also said it was necessary to remember that the wording of the Tariff Commission's recommendation is "that as a result in part of the customs treatment reflecting the concession granted in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, etc." and added it could hardly be denied that the imports of groundfish are in part threatening or causing serious injury.

5. It was emphasized to Hauge that one point which troubled us was that the Tariff Commission's report mentions there are a number of causes for the distress of the domestic industry but that the Commission is considering only the effect of increased imports. A reader of the report would be inclined to forget the other causes and be persuaded that imports are the sole cause of injury. To this Hauge replied that the recent amendment to the Trade Agreements Extension Act with respect to imports is now worded "have contributed substantially towards causing or threatening serious injury to such industry".

6. Up to this time of the conversation we were inclined to be somewhat pessimistic as to the recommendation the President's adviser might make concerning acceptance or non-acceptance of the Tariff Commission's recommendation. However, we were able to leave the interview with a somewhat more optimistic outlook when Hauge made mention of the new law passed by Congress — the Fisheries Act of 1956 (reference our numbered letter 1168 of August 16, 1956†) — which he remarked might be a better way of solving the New England fisheries problems than anything that had been done heretofore. Moreover, there were various nations, along with Canada, such as Iceland, Norway and Denmark, who were also concerned with the final outcome. Lastly he referred to the President's directive that, when considering problems respecting trade with Canada, every effort to see that a solution satisfactory to both parties should be found. He told us that the Administration was fully mindful of the Canadian position and the importance to Canada of groundfish exports to the United States.

7. In summary it can be said that the purpose of our visit was to reiterate once more the importance to Canada of the U.S. groundfish market, not to attempt to obtain an indication of the advice that would be given to the President on the Tariff Commission's recommendation. As it turned out we were given every reason to believe that a decision on this is yet to be reached since Hauge told us that he had not received reports from all government agencies concerned.

8. Hauge gave us a sympathetic hearing but made plain to us how much more difficult it now is for the President to reject the Tariff Commission's recommendation than it was in 1953. Last time the President in turning down the Tariff Commission's recommendation said there were other causes, along with imports, for the difficulties facing the New England fisheries but "the great unsolved problem of this industry has been how to expand its markets". He cited the new commodity "fish sticks" as a possible way of solving this problem. This, according to the experience of the last three years has not proven to be the case. In addition, with the new Escape Clause provision of the Act, it is now necessary to show only that imports "have contributed substantially towards causing or threatening serious injury" (Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 as amended, Section 7 (b)). Previously it was necessary to show imports were the primary or sole cause.

9. On the favourable side to Canada is the strategic importance of Iceland, a country which with Norway, Denmark and West Germany, is also concerned with maintaining the status quo. As Hauge mentioned these countries during our conversation, we realized the Administration is mindful of this fact. To be added to the points to be listed in our favour is the Fisheries Act of 1956 and the attitude taken by the President of Canada's preferred position as a trading partner of the U.S.

GROUNDFISH FILLETS

Smith and Gilbert were asked to call on Kalijarvi, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs, and Thibodeaux, Director of the Office of International Trade and Resources of State Department yesterday afternoon. They were informed that the purpose was to consider jointly and quite informally the situation concerning the import of groundfish fillets into the USA. It was carefully explained that in calling this meeting State Department had no intention of implying any warning or threat respecting the application of restrictions on imports. However, though in the President's decision to reject the Tariff Commission's recommendation it was implied the Chief Executive did not agree with the Tariff Commission that imports were causing injury, it was nevertheless a fact that the President's action had not written "finis" to the situation.[140] Kalijarvi said that at the time when he issued the invitation to us it was his intention we should together discuss ways and means of offsetting that which seemed to be more than a mere possibility that in Congress at this session a concerted attempt would be made to pass legislation to curtail in one way or another the imports of groundfish. He said that when he had asked us to call on him he did not then know that a delegation would be calling on him this Thursday, January 10, to make representations for relief from injury alleged to be caused by excessive imports of groundfish. He went on to say that it was fairly obvious the legislation passed in the last session of Congress, namely the Fisheries Act of 1956, fell far short of providing a solution to the problem.

2. We were asked to make any suggestions that might provide State Department with new ammunition to consider this turn of events. We went over the various points which have been repeatedly presented to the USA by us at various levels of government. We gave the USA officials no grounds for hoping that any form of self-imposed control of exports would be acceptable to Canada though we were never asked to consider such a proposition. To this both Kalijarvi and Thibodeaux replied that State Department was sympathetic to our views and that there was no need to make any further attempts to convert the converted. Their immediate concern was to find a defence against the increasing political pressures that were being built up. We went on to say that in our opinion since the New England fisheries, due to economic conditions beyond their control, were unable to compete with imports from foreign countries, it might be more logical to consider that some form of subsidy aimed at providing financial assistance in their production costs might provide a partial solution. In that much of the pressures behind the enactment of the Fisheries Act of 1956 were provided by the fact there was apparent inequality in the federal assistance given between agriculture and fisheries, perhaps increased financial assistance to fisheries would not be out of line with the thinking of those who gave their acceptance to the act.

3. We also made mention of the various meetings that had been held between representatives of the Canadian Maritimes and New England fisheries for the purpose of coming to some agreement to provide funds obtained as a toll from the sale of groundfish fillets for advertising designed to increase consumption in the USA. We expressed a degree of surprise that as yet nothing tangible had come out of these meetings and intimated that if wholehearted cooperation in this project was obtained, in our view a successful campaign would have a decidedly beneficial effect in offsetting the continual complaint against imports.

4. The situation revealed in this conversation gives rise to several interesting conjectures as to what the future holds. It is obvious that even though the President rejected the Tariff Commission's recommendation, the industry is not going to give up without a fight. The press has reported that Tom Rice, Executive Secretary, Massachusetts Fisheries Association, said the next step for New England fisheries is to seek the intervention of the Office of Defense Mobilization. Kalijarvi and Thibodeaux were inclined to agree with us that this approach did not have much chance of success.

5. Kalijarvi said that he did not know what the delegation which was meeting with him tomorrow was going to propose. However, though he was in sympathy with the Canadian viewpoint and was persuaded the difficulties facing New England were due to causes other than imports, he assured us that in face of the statistical picture of rising Canadian imports, none of these points would have any effect on the domestic industry whose minds were fixed on import restrictions.

6. Another proposal with which we may be faced is to impose voluntary restrictions on our exports. We include this suggestion for the reason it is on all fours with the arrangements that are now being made with the Japanese in their exports of textiles to the USA.

7. Failing any success along these lines: the next avenue of approach which has more serious implications would, we think, be through Congress where a bill proposing increase of duties and/or restrictive quotas may very probably be placed in the hopper. Though it may be logical to assume that the President, having set a precedent by his recent decision, would veto a bill directly proposing quota restrictions or a tariff increase, yet he might be faced with a bill designed to provide further aid to fisheries with a rider attached to it embodying industry's desire for import restriction.

8. It would be to our advantage if we could be informed immediately as to the status of the negotiations between the Maritimes and New England regarding the advertising campaign and any other suggestions that you might have that would strengthen his hand which we could pass on to Kalijarvi before tomorrow's meeting.

PETROLEUM IMPORTS INTO THE USA

In the message under reference we covered the background of the possibility that early pressures would be exerted on the Executive Branch to restrict imports of petroleum. On Friday, January 25, the Independent Producer Organizations addressed a letter to Dr. Arthur Flemming, Head of ODM, asking that steps be taken immediately to restrict imports of foreign oil, so that the restrictive machinery would be available when the Middle East oil production and transportation return to their pre-Suez potential. The key words in the latter are the request to ODM "to now take whatever steps are necessary to give assurance that imports will not be permitted to exceed the 1954 relationship (of imports to domestic production), without exception as to source or destination." This inclusive statement quite clearly refers to the waivers which the current policy stipulates for oil from Canadian and Venezuelan sources and the exception of District 5, i.e. the USA West Coast, from inclusion in the application of the import formula.

2. It seems to us probable that Dr. Flemming will reply to the Independent Producers Associations by reiterating and emphasizing the statement he made early in December 1956 when he "suspended" the consideration of whether to certify to the President under the so called National Security Clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act. Flemming pointed out at that time that when the Middle East situation had clarified he would ask the oil importers to again provide estimates of their import plans. He indicated that the plans would then be reviewed and a decision would be made as to whether or not certification should be made to the President under Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act.

3. It may be that the independents feel that they will not get much satisfaction from Flemming at this time but have approached him again with the full expectation that he will adhere to his previous stand. If they then choose to approach the legislative branch, they would be in the position to point out that every effort has been made to induce Dr. Flemming to act under the existing legislation but to no avail. (The corollary, then, could be that new and specific legislation containing quotas is the only action which would meet the alleged "threat" to the domestic industry, and which the reluctant executive branch would understand.)

4. There is not much evidence yet that the independents have met with success in beating the drums for a concentrated drive in the Senate and House for restrictive legislation, but with the temper of the Senate aroused over the price increase and the various and complicated issues of petroleum pricing and distribution to be aired before congressional committees, probably including a special committee in the Senate, the whole mater of petroleum distribution, production and imports could quite easily become a major issue in the 85th Congress. In fact, it can be expected that the independents will try to tie the recent price increases to the fear of an early resumption of imports of "cheap foreign crude".

5. We should be under no illusions concerning the relationship of the current moves of the independents on the import question to the whole matter of supplying oil from this continent to Europe. It is clear that the independents, both producers and refiners, are determined to milk every ounce of advantage out of the Middle East situation and to emerge with specific limitations on the amount of petroleum which may be imported into the USA.

6. This is not a simple or straightforward situation. While the independent refiners and independent producers appear to make common cause with respect to the 15 major international companies, the objectives of the refiners and the producers are not parallel.

7. Another factor which may have some influence on the direction of how things go within the executive branch on the petroleum import question is that Dr. Flemming is slated to return to Ohio Weslyan early in the spring to be succeeded by Mr. Gordon Gray, presently Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Affairs). While we know Flemming's views, both private and public, on the matter of oil imports, we have no idea whether Mr. Gray will be inclined to follow the same policies.

OIL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS AND MR. GORDON GRAY

Following is a suggested memorandum you might leave with Mr. Gray when you make your farewell call. You may wish to suggest some alterations in this.

CRUDE PETROLEUM

For many years trade relations between the United States and Canada have been based upon the reciprocal exchange of most-favoured-nation benefits and upon principles which do not envisage the use of import restrictions. As a result very high levels of trade in both directions have developed.

The application by the US of direct controls on the imports of any product would be a matter of vital concern, and indeed the threat of restrictions when used by the US Government to persuade their domestic distributors to restrain their imports raises many problems not only for the industries directly affected, but also for the maintenance of a sound basis for Canada-US trade relations generally.

3. With respect to crude oil, which has been assuming an increasing importance in the pattern of Canadian exports to the United States, the Canadian Government was very much aware in the years just prior to 1955 that various bills had been introduced in the United States Congress for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the importation of crude petroleum into the United States. These were rejected by Congress, and Canadian concern was allayed. The Canadian oil developments in Western Canada continued to follow a spectacular course, and the construction of pipe lines to the Great Lakes and to the Pacific moved ahead. The pipe line over the Rockies was a high cost operation and was undoubtedly constructed with a view to developing some market in the Northwest area of the United States.

4. Early in 1955 the recommendations of the United States Cabinet Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy were announced. After careful consideration by the Canadian authorities of the sections of the report dealing with crude petroleum, the Canadian Ambassador submitted an aide mémoire to the State Department on March 8, 1955,[141] setting forth Canadian views and desires with respect to the actual and potential trade in crude petroleum between the two countries.

5. In this document, we referred to our great concern lest these recommendations might become the settled policy of the United States and might lead to severe restrictions on the developing Canadian trade. We pointed to the expansion of refinery capacity and marketing plans in the United States to make use of the increasing availability of Canadian crude, not only in the Pacific Northwest but also in East St. Paul and eastward. We noted the efforts of the United States through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to promote the growth of world-wide multilateral trade on an economic basis and unhampered by restrictions. We referred to the logical economic pattern of development of the oil markets which are costly and difficult to serve from domestic U.S. wells. It was pointed out that Canada was not merely a competitor but also an important market for United States oil, and much would be lost in terms of continental efficiency if both countries were to develop their respective oil industries along purely national lines.

6. Finally we discussed the problem from the point of view of strategic considerations. Mention was made of the fact that the United States navy supported the idea of constructing the trans-mountain pipeline and of constructing additional refining capacity in the State of Washington. We pointed out that if in its best judgment the United States Government should conclude that its defence interests required in general that imports of crude oil should be limited, then such defence interests should logically require that imports from Canada be considered separately on a continental basis and should be exempted from any restrictive policy.

7. A reply to our aide-mémoire was received from the State Department dated March 24, 1955.[142] This stated that the Cabinet Committee held the view that at that time the pattern of oil imports in comparison with domestic production which prevailed in 1954 should be the target for oil imports, but that in reaching this conclusion the committee had not expressed itself regarding the sources of these imports. Moreover, the committee expressed itself as being fully familiar with the circumstances regarding imports of oil from Canada as outlined in our aide-mémoire and cognizant of the security implications with respect to Canadian oil. The State Department then expressed its hope that the policy of the committee could be implemented in such a way as to give full recognition to the factors which the Canadian Government regards as important.

8. Our great interest in maintaining unrestricted access to the United States market was again expressed to the United States Government during the meeting of the Canadian Ministers and U.S. Cabinet Officers in United States-Canadian Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs held in Ottawa on September 26, 1955.[143] It is understood that assurances were given by United States Cabinet members that, for purposes of administering the National Security Clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act, North America had been treated as a single unit.

9. Up to now, imports into the United States of crude oil from Canada appear to have been given the fair and reasonable treatment anticipated by the events mentioned above, and the soundness of this policy has been decisively illustrated during the difficult situation which followed Suez Canal crisis.

10. The inter-relationship of the U.S. refineries and the Canadian suppliers is growing steadily. Expansions are under way in the capacities of our pipe lines to the Pacific and to the Great Lakes. The assurance of a continuity of markets in the United States provides a stimulus to the further search for new oil fields in Canada. These developments do not pose a threat to the United States oil industry. They are a significant contribution to the economic strength of both countries.

OIL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS AND THE NEW DIRECTOR OF ODM

During my farewell call last Friday (April 26) on my friend Gordon Gray, I left with him a memo concerning our interest in USA oil import policies along the lines of your telegram under reference as amended by later messages† and phone conversations. I took the opportunity he was quite ready to give me to elaborate a little on the memo, stressing especially the direct relevance of Canadian oil developments to the "security" of the USA. I pointed out that any action by the USA which discouraged exploration and exploitation of oil resources in Canada could hardly contribute to USA security in a crisis. If the maximum benefit was to be secured from Canadian supplies in an emergency, it was essential that development should proceed in the meantime without impediment and that the necessary installations and pipeline facilities should be in existence. The rich oil resources of Canada would surely be at least as vital to the USA in a critical situation as would those domestic sources which required artificial stimulus for their continued development. I also emphasized the serious effects which action against oil imports could have on general relations between the USA and Canada, especially when so many other recent events, economic and otherwise, had placed an abnormal and serious strain on those relations. I concluded by saying that we had been somewhat encouraged by certain features of the material given out by ODM in connection with the recent announcement of a new investigation into the need for import restrictions. In particular, we noted that Canada had been excluded from many of the statistics and that in his advice to the President Gray had referred only to dependence upon "overseas" oil supplies. I hoped that we might take these features as evidence that, whatever might be planned for oil imports generally, the special nature of Canada's position would be recognized.

2. Gray was not surprised that I had raised the oil question in taking my leave of him. Generally speaking, he said, it had been occupying his attention almost continuously since he became Head of ODM. We would not be justified in attaching any real significance to the use of the term "overseas" in his communication to the President. That communication was intended to relate to oil imported from any source. This did not mean, however, that arrangements which might be made eventually would necessarily draw no distinction between sources on strategic or other grounds. This issue should not be prejudged but would depend on the outcome of his further enquiries.

3. Gray then spoke to me quite frankly about his approach to the general problem. At this stage, he did not know what arrangement or formula would eventually emerge. He had originally felt that, even for the immediate future, a voluntary system of restriction on imports would not be workable. Now, after his conversations with the main oil-importing companies, he was fairly confident that voluntary restraints might be practicable. If he had been less conscientious, the easiest course might have been merely to certify that imports were endangering the national security, and turn the whole problem over to the White House. He was sufficiently hopeful, however, that something fairly satisfactory could be produced that he had thought it worthwhile recommending that he be given some additional time to explore the possibilities. He would not be surprised if he found himself able to report back in six weeks or two months that a voluntary arrangement was functioning effectively. He could not say just what kind of arrangement might be made, or whether a distinction would be maintained among sources or among the USA importing districts. He could give no assurance on this score. He did say, however, that, in connection with any short-term arrangement or any longer-term solution, he, personally, recognized the importance of Canadian sources of oil in relation to "the collective security" of our two countries.

4. While Gray was hopeful that something reasonably adequate could be devised, he was greatly concerned at the possibility that the sort of arrangement which might be made would gradually work him into the position of a "Judge Landis of the oil industry". He might find himself more deeply involved in the operations of the industry than he would consider desirable or than anyone in the present administration would think appropriate. If he became responsible for supervising imports of oil in some manner (which he implied might be more likely under a voluntary system than under a formal system based on legislation or formal regulations) and the prices of petroleum products to domestic consumers then increased, he might be expected to intervene with the industry; thus it might go on from one thing to another until he assumed a much larger role than would be appropriate for a government official in the kind of economy which is desired in this country.

5. Gray then referred to some of the longer-range possibilities which were being explored, with emphasis particularly on the possibility of tariff action. He mentioned the views which Senator O'Mahoney had expressed on this subject and said that, if what the Senator had in mind was an across-the-board increase in oil tariffs, this would not serve the security interest of the USA. The main effect would be to help the lower-cost Middle and Fareastern producers at the expense of Venezuela and Canada. Since the sole concern of ODM was with the national security aspects, he was not much attracted by the idea of a simple tariff increase. He thought, however, that possibly something might be done by selective tariff adjustments which favoured the types of petroleum products coming from sources of greatest security value to the USA. He indicated that one of the technical people in the Tariff Commission had suggested the possibility of applying different rates on the basis of the specific gravity of the types of oil produced by different countries. He recalled that the USA tariff on other commodities at present contains some concealed discrimination among countries through the peculiar way in which some items have deliberately been defined (e.g., the special tariff treatment of Latakia tobacco). He did not know how practicable such a device might be in the case of petroleum if it were decided that some distinction should be made, he had, however, asked the State Department to let him have a report on the precedents. He observed that open or concealed discrimination would present problems for the State Department in relation to the countries of the Mideast.

6. Gray also commented on the inadequacy for any length of time of the formula adopted earlier by the President's Advisory Committee under which imports could be kept to a fixed percentage of domestic production. He did not quite see the basis on which one could select a particular percentage as reflecting the volume of imports consistent with the national security interests of the USA. Moreover, if any particular percentage were to be maintained while domestic production continued to decline, the net effect would be to reduce the total availability of oil to USA users.

7. Finally, Gray referred to the strong pressure which was being exerted upon the administration by a great variety of congressmen and senators. It seemed that constituencies in almost every part of the country were involved either as producers of oil or of coal. The group with whom he had recently met had included liberals and conservatives from virtually all parts of the country, including one new Senator (Morton of Kentucky) who as an Assistant Secretary of State had previously "fought tooth and toenail" against any action to restrict oil imports. There was no indication that any of the representatives or senators thought the administration was going too far. In fact some of them were critical of the ODM for not having dealt with residual oils.

8. In connection with the timing of the exchange between himself and the President, resulting in the launching of this new investigation, Gray said that he had thought it essential to get something out publicly before Congress resumed after the Easter recess.

9. This conversation was certainly most interesting but I find it quite impossible to judge where Gray will eventually come out. I am confident that he will insist on a very thorough examination before making any further definite move. In talking with us he was doing so as a personal friend as well as an official, thinking out loud and saying quite freely what was on his mind. My impression is that, because he prefers "the rule of law to the rule of men", he may favour for the longer-term future something more precise, formal and predictable (possibly through the tariff) to a voluntary system which must leave so much discretion and responsibility to officials of the administration. Since Gray was speaking so frankly and freely, I would suggest that this message be given limited distribution and that no reference be made outside the government service to the thoughts which he expressed to me. Ritchie and Chappell accompanied me on my visit to Mr. Gray.

ALSIKE CLOVER SEED — UNITED STATES TARIFF

1. We are disturbed to hear that the Tariff Commission is recommending to the President that on imports of alsike clover seed the tariff quota be maintained at the level of the last two years, and we would request that an aide-mémoire be left with the State Department setting forth the views of the Canadian Government on this matter. The following points should be made.

2. We note that the Tariff Commission has again examined the protective measures which have been taken during the last three years against the importation of alsike clover seed into the United States and has recommended that the present tariff quota be maintained.

3. The Canadian Government had expected that the present impairment to the tariff concession on alsike clover seed would be eliminated after June 30 of this year. The concession in the United States tariff on this commodity was negotiated by Canada under the GATT in 1947 and the agreed rate of 2¢ per pound was bound in the Trade Agreement against increase. When in 1954[144] and again in 1955[145] the United States took emergency action under Article XIX of the GATT to withdraw this concession and to impose a much higher rate of duty on imports above a specified quantity, the Canadian Government assumed that this was a purely temporary measure and that the tariff concession would be fully restored as soon as the emergency conditions ceased to exist. It should be noted that Article XIX of the GATT stipulates that a concession may be suspended only to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy a serious injury, and only if there is clear evidence that such an injury or threat of injury results directly from increased imports.

4. We would point out that the conditions with respect to the marketing of alsike clover seed which prevailed in previous years no longer exists and in the view of the Canadian authorities there would seem to be no grounds whatever to justify a continuation of the action taken under Article XIX. There are no surplus supplies in the market. Production in both the United States and Canada appears to be quite reasonable in relation to expected demand.

5. In the light of these considerations and of the implications of any action of this nature on trade relations between Canada and the United States we would urge the United States Government to ensure that the tariff concession granted to Canada should be fully restored.

6. In addition to the above points for inclusion in an aide-mémoire, we are giving you the following data on alsike clover seed, production and prices, for your information and for any discussions you may have on this subject.

7. Alsike acreage in the United States has decreased substantially since 1953, and, despite record yields on the 1956 season, crop requirements for consumption exceeded U.S. production by 2,500,000 pounds at prices considerably above the 1953 season. Requirements resulting from the Soil Bank operations should increase requirements further.

Prices — the average price to growers for three seasons, 1954 to 1956, was about $27 per 100 lbs. or 165 per cent of the 1953 season's price. U.S.D.A. quotes $32.20 for the 1956 season. Although prices to growers declined to $24.70 a hundred in March 1957, the retail price in March 1957 at $48.20 was 157 per cent of the average February to May 1954. It is of note that the spread between prices received and prices paid averaged $13.50 per cent February-May 1953, was $7.60 per 100 pounds in Sept. 1956 & $23.50 per 100 pounds in March 1957.[146]

LEAD AND ZINC

Confirming our conversation of yesterday, State Department called us yesterday to give us the preliminary details of the proposal that will be submitted to Congress in the near future.

2. Following a directive from the Cabinet, to the effect that a proposal must be submitted to Congress that will provide increased protection for the lead and zinc industry against imports by an increase in the duties that will correspond with the recommendations made by the Tariff Commission in their report of May 1954, the plan that has been worked up by the Department of the Interior, and agreed to by the other departments concerned, will provide for a sliding scale of duties that will increase to a maximum as the price of lead and zinc goes down. The exact price ranges, and the exact amount of the duty increases are not yet firm but it is probable that the price under which the first increment of the increased duties will start to operate will be 17-cents per pound for common lead at New York, and 14 1/2 cents per lb for prime western zinc East St. Louis. (It will be noted that the price of zinc during 1956 was 13 1/2 cents and averaged 12.3 cents during 1955. The average price of lead in 1956 was 16 cents and in 1955 averaged 14.9 cents). The floor at which the maximum increase in duties will operate may be 14 1/2 cents for lead and 12 or 2 1/2 cents for zinc.

[146] Un aide-mémoire fondé sur ce message a été envoyé au Département d'État le 16 mai 1957.
An aide-mémoire based on this message was delivered to the State Department on May 16, 1957.

3. The first increment for lead will probably be an increase of 1 cent and it will then go up by 1 cent increment as the price drops. For zinc the increments will probably be 3/4 cents. The total maximum increase in the duty (or it may be billed as an excise tax) will probably be about 3 cents per pound for lead and 2 cents per pound for zinc (it is possible that maximum of all duties plus increments will be 3 and 2 cents respectively). It is not proposed that any relief to the domestic industry by way of tax rebates or tax exemptions will be included in the proposal that is to be submitted to Congress. It is also suggested that the Department of Agriculture will agree to restarting its barter programme, but we have not been able to confirm this from the Department of Agriculture. According to the State Department, if and when the barter programme is begun again the emphasis will be on the disposal of grains rather than the support of the lead and zinc market. Previously the bartering of lead and zinc was undertaken in order to remove surplus lead and zinc from the market and thus support the price of those metals at current levels. Now we are informed that bartering will only go on as long as the Department of Agriculture believes that sales of surplus agricultural commodities by barter are not affecting the sale of such surplus agricultural commodities by the USA by normal commercial methods.

4. When questioned on how the State Department proposes to deal with the question of compensation that is required under the GATT for such increases in duties, they had no solution to offer, freely admitting that under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act they have no authority to offer any concessions that would begin to represent adequate compensation. Moreover, they are not sure how they will propose negotiating but seem to think that the procedure established by Article XXVIII of the GATT would be used more probably than Article XXIV.

5. We do not know when the report of a mineral's programme (which will include suggestions for other types of aid for other metals) will be made available, or when the resulting enabling bills to Congress will be ready. We anticipate, however, that the programme will be made public within a few days and probably not later than next week. It has been made quite clear to us that nothing we can say can change the determination of the administration to go ahead with this programme.

6. The Ambassador has an appointment to see Mr. C. Douglas Dillon, Deputy Under Secretary for Economic Affairs, at 10.15 am on May 29, in order to discuss this development which can only be regarded as a most serious breach in the determination of the administration to resist pressures for protection on important items for international trade. We would hope, therefore, that you can let us have your comments before that meeting.

LEAD AND ZINC

We are seriously concerned about the information received regarding tariffs on lead and zinc and a new barter programme whereby these metals would be imported in exchange for surplus grain. As you are well aware these proposed measures would cause serious damage to important Canadian trade and economic interests and would be bound to have a profound effect on Canadian-U.S. trade relations. In view of the seriousness and urgency of the situation we are outlining points which we would appreciate your using as a basis for your discussions tomorrow with Mr. Dillon. We would leave it to your judgement whether these points should be incorporated tomorrow in a paper which you might leave with him. Mr. Howe hopes there may be some possibility of getting the Americans to drop the idea of a new barter programme including wheat even if in spite of our efforts higher tariffs on lead and zinc are adopted. In addition to Dillon, we would be grateful if you could arrange to make representations at the White House to Adams and Hauge.

2. In addition to the following points you might wish to use those which the President himself made (in 1954 and 1955) in rejecting proposals for increased protection.

1. The Canadian Government is seriously concerned about the information that the United States Cabinet has reached a decision to establish additional duties on lead and zinc and to reinstate a barter programme for the importation of these metals in exchange for surplus grain. Both these sets of measures would, if implemented, cause serious damage to important trade and economic interests and would be bound to have a profound effect on Canadian-U.S. trade relations.

2. It will be recalled that in May[147] and July,[148] 1954 and March,[149] 1955, when restrictive measures affecting lead and zinc were under consideration in the United States, the Canadian Government made formal representations expressing its views on this subject and pointing out that such restrictive measures would have adverse effects, not only on Canadian-United States trade relations, but also on the strategic interests of both countries.

3. Canada exports over 54 per cent of its total production of lead and zinc to the United States. Canadian exports of lead ore and metal to the United States totalled over $12 million and exports of zinc ore and metal to the United States totalled over $54 million in 1956. The production of these metals is widely distributed throughout Canada and the producers are vitally dependent on access to the U.S.A. market.

4. These proposed U.S.A. policies are obviously intended to relieve the domestic mining industry in the United States from making adjustments to changing market conditions. The burden of readjustment would be shifted to the shoulders of producers outside the United States. If the proposed restrictive measures are implemented they will relegate Canadian producers to the position of marginal suppliers to the United States market to be restricted whenever convenient. The question would arise whether this is the basis upon which Canada and the United States are to conduct trade and doubts would be raised about the status and validity of the trade agreement between our two countries.

5. The current U.S. tariff rates on lead and zinc ores and metals have been negotiated and bound against increase with Canada under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. These tariff concessions thus form an important part of the trade agreement governing relations between the two countries, under which many significant trade benefits have been exchanged and policies pursued jointly for the reduction of trade barriers throughout the world. The proposed measures to increase tariffs on lead and zinc would constitute a serious impairment of contractual obligations by the United States. Furthermore no compensation in terms of equivalent tariff concessions would be possible.

6. From the point of view of lead and zinc producers in general, including those in the United States, these proposed policies would have the effect of keeping prices so high as to discourage the use of zinc in relation to other competitive metals and thus would do great damage to long-term prospects for zinc production.

7. The resumption of the barter programme would further aggravate the damage caused by the proposed tariff increases, by involving the question of grain surplus disposal in addition to lead and zinc. Substantial and continuing damage is being inflicted on Canadian producers of wheat and other grains by U.S.A. agricultural disposal policies. The Canadian Government has repeatedly protested to the United States Government with respect to the effects of U.S.A. agricultural policies on Canadian exports of wheat and grains to traditional markets throughout the world. It would be a matter of the most serious concern if, far from seeking to modify these policies in order to take Canadian interests more fully into account, and in spite of the repeated protests that have been made, the United States Government were again to embark on special barter operations for these products.

8. In view of all these considerations, the Canadian Government would most seriously urge that the proposals now being considered should not be implemented either with respect to the tariff increases on lead and zinc or with respect to the resumption of a barter programme involving grains.

LEAD AND ZINC

As expected, I saw Dillon, the Deputy Under-Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, this morning, and gave him the informal memo setting forth the view contained in paragraph 2 of your message. I also referred to the arguments against the use of the tariff device which President Eisenhower had deployed in his statement in 1954, and I suggested that the same reasoning seemed to me still to be applicable. I emphasized how seriously action against imports of Canadian lead and zinc would be regarded in Canada. In addition to the arguments in the memo, there was the consideration which many Canadians would have very much in mind that trade between Canada and the USA was substantially, almost overwhelmingly, "out of balance". The kind of action apparently contemplated was difficult to reconcile with defence and other relationships on this continent. Whatever might be said about remote and possibly vulnerable sources of supply, it was clear that economic sources in Canada were of strategic value to the USA. I recalled that the lead and zinc items in the USA tariff had a long history so far as Canada was concerned. For over twenty years the rates on these items had been considered among the main benefits received by Canada in return for concessions which we had made in tariff negotiations with the USA. Finally, I noted that the proposed action would affect, in addition to Canada, a variety of countries of some political importance to the USA. In this connection I mentioned particularly Yugoslavia, in view of the arguments which have been made to us recently about using economic measures to encourage Eastern European satellites which might be showing signs of liberal tendencies.

2. In commenting on the views which we had expressed, Dillon held out no prospect of the administration changing its plans for protecting the domestic lead and zinc industries. About the only encouraging thing which he said during the whole conversation was that he questioned our info about any decision to revive the barter programme. To the best of his knowledge, no consideration had been given to this possibility in connection with the lead and zinc problem. The recommendations had been produced mainly by the Department of Interior and they had nothing to do with arrangements for bartering agricultural products. Such little comfort as we took from these remarks by Dillon has since been diminished considerably by a report from the Department of Agriculture that barter operations are being resumed, although apparently on a more limited scale than in the past. While Dillon may well have been right in indicating that any resumption of barter activities was not part of the programme for dealing within the lead and zinc problem, the effects could be equally disturbing.

3. Apart from his remarks about barter, Dillon's replies to our comments were directed primarily at explaining why higher protection of the lead and zinc industries had become virtually inevitable and how such protective action could be reconciled with the international obligations of the USA.

4. Dillon reminded us that, when vetoing a 1955 measure for accelerating the stockpiling of these metals, the President had promised to present a long-term minerals policy. During the current year, the President had again indicated in one of his messages to Congress that he would be submitting proposals for dealing with the longer-term problems relating to mineral production in the USA, especially lead and zinc. The proposals of which we had been generally informed were largely the result of the work which the Department of Interior had since been carrying out on this subject. These proposals would probably have been presented earlier if Seaton, the Secretary of the Interior, had not been ill. The State Department would naturally have preferred that no action be taken in view of its responsibilities for USA commercial policies and for the international relations of the USA. Along with other departments, the State Department now accepted that something had to be done.

5. Dillon stressed that on this occasion the USA was not "hiding behind strategic considerations". The simple facts were that the lead and zinc industry was spread over some 47 states and was facing serious difficulties. Perhaps the measures taken earlier (including barter operations) had forced prices too high, but there could be little doubt that prices were falling to levels which endangered these domestic industries. Dillon said that the temper of Congress was to favour extreme action. If the administration refrained from presenting a programme, the extremists in Congress would produce their own and the President would have great difficulty in resisting it. If, on the other hand, the administration submits what it regards as a minimum programme, Congress may be persuaded to be satisfied with such limited action. If, confronted with a reasonable proposal from the administration, Congress passes a measure which goes much further, the President will be in a better position to veto it.

6. In connection with the position in Congress, Dillon also referred to the possible relationship between adequate protective action now on lead and zinc and the renewal next year of the reciprocal trade agreements act. This argument, like that in the above paragraph, is one with which we have become familiar. Dillon added no particularly new glosses to it beyond asserting that thorough preparation was now beginning for the renewal of the Trade Agreement Act and that their view on the relationship between action on these metals and the fate of next year's legislation reflected a careful judgement.

7. With reference to the suggestion in our memorandum that an increase in lead and zinc tariffs would constitute a breach of the contractual obligations of the USA, Dillon contended that the proposed changes in tariff rates could be squared with the requirements of the GATT. He mentioned the facilities which will be available under the new version of Article XXVIII to permit alterations in tariff rates without specific justification. He also referred to the possible applicability of the escape clause in Article XIX. He suggested that there were other provisions of the GATT which might be relevant. He recognized that even if such action conformed with the GATT there would remain the problem of finding compensation. He realized that the scope available to the USA administration for providing compensation through additional tariff concessions was severely restricted and probably inadequate; unless of course countries affected might be prepared to accept partial compensation in this form now and wait for the balance until the USA administration secures further authority to reduce tariffs next year under the new Trade Agreements Act (which Dillon hopes will be better than the present version). If compensation could not be given in this way, the USA would have no alternative but to acquiesce in the withdrawal by other countries of equivalent concessions. This was something which the USA would not like to see encouraged, but since on this occasion the USA would have been responsible for starting the process, it could hardly complain.

8. Dillon added very little to our still incomplete info about exactly what the administration will be recommending. He confirmed that some type of sliding scale would be used, which he thought would lessen the effect of the new rates on prices and hence on the competitive position of substitute materials. He indicated that if the price went above the maximum covered by the new rates, even the existing tariff rates would then cease to be applicable.

9. At the conclusion of the conversation, Dillon assured me that our representations would receive consideration but warned me that he could not be hopeful about the outcome. I shall, of course, have further talks about these matters when I see Governor Adams and Dr. Hauge.

LEAD AND ZINC: GOVERNOR ADAMS

I was able to see Governor Adams earlier than I had expected, as he very kindly invited me to make my call on him first thing this afternoon. I took advantage of the visit to leave him a copy of the memo which we had given to Mr. Dillon. Governor Adams read this memo while I was with him and after reading it said he sympathized very much with us in the difficulties which this action might create for Canadian producers. He then asked me what we would do if we were in the same position as the USA administration. I could only reply that, although we might not always have been consistent, we had on several occasions taken quite a severe line when marginal firms in one industry or another were having a hard time. He said that he was familiar with the Canadian Government's courageous stand in several instances such as the textile industry. I confirmed that this was one of the examples which I had in mind, and I recalled particularly the decision of the Government in connection with the woollen goods tariff.

2. Governor Adams referred, as Dillon had earlier in the day, to the influence which lead and zinc producers had in Congress and particularly in the Senate in view of the wide distribution of lead and zinc properties and plants throughout most of the states. He mentioned, too, the difficulties anticipated for next year in getting a further extension of the Trade Agreements Act. He said that the criticism currently being levelled at the legislation regarding the organization for trade cooperation was really aimed at weakening the administration's position on the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in 1958. He expressed his own opinion that even an act of the kind passed last year (the so called HR1) would not be approved if it were presented to Congress at the present moment. The administration was going to have to be very careful over the next nine months or a year in preparing the way for the new trade agreements legislation. He noted that what was described as a "long range minerals policy" was in fact mainly a matter of "ingeniously and dexterously" devising some means of looking after the industry without upsetting the tariff. At this point he appeared to be thinking of suggestions that an excise tax might be imposed on imported lead and zinc instead of an increase in tariff rates. I did not comment on the distinction which he appeared to be making since I assumed that one would be about as objectionable as the other from our point of view. The Governor also intimated that, in working out their "long range minerals policy", the administration had been anxious to avoid the continuation of "open market" purchases, as the stockpile was now overflowing with these minerals. He intimated that he personally was against intervention by the Treasury to provide such artificial support. (I took his remark as implying also that he probably was averse to subsidies for similar reasons.)

3. I pointed out that there were serious protectionist pressures in Canada as well, as I was sure the Governor would be as concerned as anyone at the consequences which might follow if in response to the proposed USA action the Canadian Government had to start withdrawing some major concessions on USA product. I also recalled, as I had during the conversation with Dillon, that lead and zinc had occupied a prominent place over the years in our tariff relations with the USA. It was hard to say just what reactions might be precipitated by measures which the USA might adopt affecting the trade in these products.

4. Governor Adams asserted several times that while he could agree with almost everything I was saying, he did not see what else they could do. He gave the impression that he and Clarence Randall had on several occasions discussed the importance of trade relations between Canada and the USA and had apparently recognized that they merited special treatment. No way had been found, however, of reconciling the difficulties which were being experienced in commercial relations between the two countries.

5. Governor Adams then referred to other cases where the USA was being faced with an inescapable dilemma. Domestic and national considerations were in conflict with the interests of other countries. He said that, within the administration, Secretary Dulles had been taking him and others to task because what they were doing was destroying the commercial policies required for good international relations. (I found this remark rather interesting since my understanding has been that Dulles has usually not been particularly aware of the connection between commercial policies and general foreign policies.) Governor Adams referred to petroleum and remarked, as an aside (which may or may not have significance), that this was one case which "did not affect Canada at all". He said that he and the others who were working on the petroleum problem were finding it pretty intractable.

6. However serious the problems relating to these various products might be, Governor Adams doubted that we would consider them in the same class as the difficulties associated with the disposal of surplus agricultural products. He felt that those concerned in the USA administration had been trying more conscientiously to take account of Canada's interest in this field, and he mentioned the Polish case as an example of their desire to be as accommodating as possible. He realized that the large problems related to surplus agricultural products were far from being solved, and he added that the man who developed a satisfactory solution would "really deserve a sainthood".

7. At the end of the conversation Governor Adams assured me again of his readiness to discuss problems which might arise between Canada and the USA and his willingness to receive any suggestions which we might be able to make for getting over the difficulties.

While there can be no question of his good will, I found little consolation in the talk with him so far as lead and zinc were concerned.

LEAD AND ZINC: CONVERSATION WITH SECRETARY HUMPHREY

In the course of my official visits, I called this morning on Mr. Humphrey, who, as you know, is leaving his post as Secretary of the Treasury within the next few weeks. I found him in very good form, although apparently somewhat exasperated with Government and rather relishing the project of getting back to private business. He told me that he would be glad to "return to Canada" and said that he had come to regard himself as largely a Canadian. In both his private business and in his service with the Government he had had a good deal to do with Canadian affairs. He was high in his praise for the way things are done in Canada and expressed his great admiration for Mr. Howe in particular. He thought it natural that there should be close cooperation between two such countries as Canada and the USA.

2. Although not intending to draw Secretary Humphrey into a discussion on the subject in view of his imminent departure, I remarked that there was one problem coming up which could be quite serious; namely the action which the USA was proposing to take on lead and zinc.

3. Mr. Humphrey reacted very quickly and strongly. He did not agree that what was contemplated would really hurt Canada. He personally thought that something like this should have been done three years ago. At that time he had understood from the representatives of the major Canadian mining companies with whom he had talked that they too would have preferred to have had some more definite decision. As they had expressed it to him, they then thought it best to "get it over and done with and stop all the conversation". Instead (and largely because of the Mexican difficulties of that time), the Government resorted to methods which were unsatisfactory to all concerned. The firms in the USA did not know where they stood and foreign firms were faced with continuing uncertainty. Since then nobody has known whether, on a particular day, the Office of Defense Mobilization would or would not buy some quantity or other. The foreign companies were always unsure whether or not they were eligible to sell lead and zinc to the ODM on those occasions when it was prepared to purchase. Everything depended on the state of somebody's digestion. It was much better to have fixed rules in order that those concerned would have something firm on which to base their operations.

4. Mr. Humphrey obviously thought that the particular rules which were being proposed were not too bad. He indicated that the intention was to let the market play its part (presumably through the sliding scale feature) in a way which would "stabilize" the present pattern of trade or flow of metal. The rates proposed might or might not turn out to be exactly the right ones. They were being examined carefully in order to make them as accurate as possible for the purpose in mind.

5. I asked whether an increase in taxes or rates of duty would not be likely to depress the prices of lead and zinc abroad. He clearly did not think that this would be the case. As he put it, the economic effects of the proposed measures could be "put in your eye". Imports would continue about as in the past and production in the USA would be no more than maintained. Certainly production here would not be increased by action of the kind contemplated.

6. Secretary Humphrey repeated that the great merit of the system under discussion was that it would replace uncertainty with certainty. The industry in the USA and elsewhere would not have to continue on a "by guess and by God" basis. It would have something more solid on which to base its plans. The market would, of course, fluctuate, as it should, but there would no longer be indefiniteness about what the Government might do. Mr. Humphrey remarked that if he were head of Consolidated he would much prefer this system to the situation which they and other Canadian producers had been up against during the past three years. They would no longer be subject to arbitrary decisions by Government officials.

7. Secretary Humphrey implied that there was still a problem about Mexican lead since the Mexican authorities had some sort of "compensating bonus" which would come into operation more or less automatically as at least a partial offset to any increase in tariff rates (and presumably excise taxes) charged by foreign governments on material imported from Mexico. He did not indicate how they expected to deal with this "problem".

8. I had the impression that, in making these comments, Mr. Humphrey was speaking less as a Secretary of the Treasury than as an industrialist. He made his points with vigour and evident conviction. Several times he expressed the judgment that the arrangement now envisaged was the most "businesslike" one that could be found to fit the circumstances.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 2, 1956

You may recall that on January 9 the Minister of Transport introduced to Cabinet a Bill to amend the Telegraphs Act so as to provide for the licensing of external telecommunications. The desirability of a licensing system had been accepted by Cabinet in December 1954,[150] when consideration was being given to the application of the Commercial Cable Company for the right to land a trans-Atlantic cable in Canada. My memorandum† to you of January 13 set forth certain objections to the Bill submitted, which had not been discussed with this Department.

At this morning's meeting Cabinet will have before it a memorandum† from the Minister of Transport requesting general guidance on the licensing question and setting forth three possible courses of action, viz:

(1) Making the proposed licensing procedure applicable to all external telecommunications, whether by trans-oceanic cable or by land line.

(2) Exempting terminal traffic between Canada and the United States but including trans-border land lines used for transmission of messages to countries other than the United States.

(3) Licensing only trans-oceanic cables.

The suggestion is made that, although a limitation of the licensing procedure to trans-oceanic cables would leave gaps in the control of external telecommunications, it would suffice for the purposes of the Department of Transport, pending a general review of the Government's communications policy and a thorough revision of existing legislation.

I would recommend that you oppose the acceptance at this time of any of these courses leading to piecemeal amendment of the Telegraphs Act, unless the Department of Transport can demonstrate that there is urgent need for licensing at this time. If there is no immediate urgency I can see no reason why the necessary comprehensive review of communications legislation could not be carried out in the course of the next few months. It is quite possible that when the whole question has been examined by the interested departments the agreed recommendations to Cabinet would include licensing provisions along the lines now being considered. At the moment, however, we are not in a position to determine which, if any, of these particular suggestions would be appropriate as we have not had an opportunity to weigh their implications. We also consider that an amendment of the Telegraphs Act limited to the question of licensing external telecommunications would invite the criticism of Mr. Gordon McLaren and others connected with the application of the Commercial Cable Company that the Government was unsure of its right to handle that application as it did.

In the event that Mr. Marler does consider that there is an urgent need for licensing and that in consequence the Telegraphs Act should be amended to provide only for this, I would recommend that a decision be deferred until the question has been discussed between departments at the official level. We would much prefer, however, to deal with it as part of a general review.

We would not wish to give the impression that we were opposed to licensing per se as we have agreed on the desirability of measures of this sort. What we have our doubts about is the timing and procedure proposed by Transport.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire du Cabinet

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary to Cabinet

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 17, 1956

Dear Mr. Bryce,

You may recall that on February 2 the Minister of Transport presented for consideration by Cabinet a Memorandum setting forth the need for amendment of the Telegraphs Act. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the licensing of certain external telecommunications facilities so as to permit the Minister more readily to control new cable landings or the replacement of existing cables. Cabinet considered, however, that before a decision was reached on the matter it should be discussed by officials of the interested departments.

In view of Cabinet's conclusion I would suggest, if you concur, that the various proposals be considered by the Ad Hoc Committee on Telecommunications Policy or by representatives of those departments most directly concerned. It seems to me that there are three points which the Committee might wish to consider and on which it might advise Ministers.

(1) Is an amendment relating to this particular subject necessary at this time or can it be delayed pending completion of a comprehensive review and revision of all present legislation in the communications field? It would appear that the complexity of the questions to be considered in the broader field (including some of those being examined by the Royal Commission on Broadcasting) may be such that this revision cannot be completed for two or three years and that action concerning licensing provisions should be taken before that time; nevertheless I think that the Committee should consider this question and advise upon it.

(2) What is the connection between these proposals and pending activities of such foreign companies as C.C.C., Western Union, etc. (including the current Court order to Western Union to divest itself of its international cable operations)?

(3) Are the proposed regulatory powers broader and less defined than necessary? In this connection I think it would be most helpful if we could have some indication of the form of regulations which would be proposed under the powers now being sought or the general principles which would be used as a guide. It might be well to consider whether some indication of the guiding principles should accompany the submission of the proposed amendment to Parliament.

No doubt there are other facets of this question which can and should be considered before advice is given to Ministers on this proposed legislation.

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 29, 1956

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE TELEGRAPHS ACT

I understand that Mr. Marler's memorandum of January 30 will be considered again by Cabinet at its meeting tomorrow and that a decision in principle will be sought on the scope of the proposed licensing system for external telecommunications.

This question has now been discussed with officials of the Department of Transport at a meeting under the chairmanship of Mr. Bryce, and I am satisfied that the introduction of a licensing system should not await the completion of a comprehensive revision of all communications legislation. This revision will be a lengthy process, perhaps taking as long as three years to complete, and will involve the reaching of policy decisions on a number of questions. In the meantime the Department of Transport wishes to be in a position to control (or at least to influence the course of) a number of developments in the field of telecommunications. These include the current court order to Western Union to divest itself of its foreign cable operations (and the disposition of its exclusive contract with Canadian National Telegraphs) and the expiration in 1957 of Canadian Pacific Telegraphs contract with the Commercial Cable Company. It is considered desirable that the Department of Transport, without attempting to make fundamental changes in the present pattern of Canadian external telecommunications, should be in a position to influence operations of the large international carriers which might have a harmful effect on Canadian companies or, in the broader sphere, on Canadian national interests. I understand that the two questions of most concern are routing and capacity. On the latter point there have been a number of recent technical developments which make it possible, through the installation of repeaters on existing cables, to increase capacity four or more times. There is no way, under existing law, whereby such radical changes could be controlled — indeed it is doubtful whether the Minister would have the power to intervene were a company to replace an existing cable with a modern one of many times the capacity.

In my previous memoranda on this subject I questioned the sweeping nature of the powers being sought and I understand that when Cabinet has reached a decision on the scope of the proposed licensing system the bill will be redrafted with this point in mind. After the discussion with Transport, however, I appreciate the fact that a certain amount of flexibility is required and that it would be undesirable to set forth in the text of the bill all the situations with which it is designed to cope. I understand that when, in the near future, the revised bill is submitted for Cabinet consideration Mr. Marler will present an outline of the remarks he intends to make in the House on the occasion of second reading. In these remarks he would indicate as specifically as possible the purposes which are in mind and the manner in which the licensing requirements would be applied.

The Department of Transport are prepared to limit the scope of the licensing system to overseas cables and I therefore recommend that you support acceptance of this proposal in principle, subject to further discussion of the draft bill when it has been prepared.[151]

VERY URGENT FOR THIS MORNING. Ottawa, April 16, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

THE COMMERCIAL CABLE COMPANY
BILL 212 TO AMEND THE TELEGRAPH ACT
APPLICATION FOR NEW TRANS ATLANTIC CO-AXIAL CABLE

You asked for a letter from me first thing this morning so here it is.

All that the leading newspapers in the United States and Canada and your own department have said, about the iniquitous Maryland Legislation to prohibit Canadian Breweries Ltd. entering into business or expanding in the United States, could be said about the action of the Canadian Government in refusing permission for an old established U.S. Cable Co. to build a new trans-Atlantic cable with outlets in Nova Scotia (no land lines).[152] Especially when it has been in business in Canada for over 70 years and its customers require added services which cannot be supplied by others. Just think over that analogy.

Not satisfied with this illegal refusal, which I feel confident would be reversed in the courts, and to further restrict any possible action or expansion and to discourage competition, Bill 212 is now introduced.[153] This is just the voice of special interest, namely C.O.T.C., a Crown Corporation, seeking and conniving for favoured treatment, while masquerading as proponents of the public weal. There is no better saying than — a quality product at a bargain price cannot happen in a monopolistic or state controlled industry — whereas — where industry is free to compete we can always look for new achievements and new gains for the customer.

Mr. Marler has been honest enough with me in the past year or more to infer quite plainly that it is the intention of the Liberal Government to make a monopoly out of the C.O.T.C. in restraint of all other communication companies. I think your public will be surprised to hear that, especially in view of all your combines investigations. At any rate the people of Canada (whether interested or not), the press of North America and, least and last to find out, the members of parliament will have to be told about this application and the government's circumventing same by a round-about method. At least the Maryland people were open and above board.

The various Commonwealth agreements on telecommunications have never been implemented by Parliament, except maybe in so far as setting up C.O.T.C. in 1948. WHEN THAT WAS DONE THE GOVERNMENT THROUGH ITS MINISTER OF TRANSPORT THEN PROMISED PARLIAMENT THAT SUCH SETTING UP OF C.O.T.C. WOULD NOT INTERFERE IN ANY WAY WITH THE OTHER ESTABLISHED CABLE COMPANIES — WHAT A PROMISE?

All I ask is justice and fair play. I am quite open to being shown my attitude is wrong. Unfortunately perhaps I come of a fighting clan of hot-headed Scotsmen and under these circumstances am raring for a wide open fight on all fronts.

For your information the matter of the application of my clients is I believe being declassified and taken off the restricted list — so get your press releases ready defending your action.

I told you I would do nothing until I heard from you sometime later today. Hoping you will have something encouraging to tell me after your consultations,

Sincerely,

GORDON MACLAREN

P.S. (CONFIDENTIAL)

Mark my words! It is more than my guess that England will agree to this cable being laid and landed in Great Britain with all requested outlets. You should hear this within two months. So beat them to it. Do not let the U.S. think we still follow the U.K. The cable could even by-pass Canada. There is nothing to lose in granting permission except the objection of C.O.T.C. There is a lot to lose if Canada has no outlets when needed; as they are by my client right now. Furthermore the cable ship spending a million dollars a year in Halifax would not be there if the cable went elsewhere, aside from the vast capital expenditures and employment in Nova Scotia. Remember this is election year in Nova Scotia. Also in time of emergency, I know, if you do not, that it would be well to have these added cable facilities handy for our use, if the Russians do not cut them all with their 485 submarines.

AMENDMENT TO THE TELEGRAPHS ACT REGARDING APPLICATION FOR NEW TRANS ATLANTIC CABLE

I am returning the rather vigorous letter which you have had from Mr. Maclaren. It is not very practicable for us to attempt to prepare a reply at this stage. We would hope that the statement which Mr. Marler will be making on the second reading of Bill 212 within the next few days would serve as an answer to the main points made by Mr. Maclaren.[154] Until that statement has been given it would probably be undesirable for us to anticipate in a letter to Mr. Maclaren the reasoning which Mr. Marler will use — especially as we have been unable to secure the text of the remarks which the Minister of Transport is expected to make.

2. Although the Bill would seem to be an appropriate one and would appear to be in keeping with the earlier decisions of Cabinet, the Department of Transport has not handled this matter in a way which is very satisfactory from our point of view. It had been understood among the members of the ad hoc interdepartmental committee that after the last discussion on this subject in that committee towards the end of February three things would happen:

(a) a revised version of Mr. Marler's memorandum of January 30 proposing an amendment to the Telegraphs Act would be considered by Cabinet;

(b) there would then be further discussion at the official level on the actual language of the draft Bill; and

(c) an outline of the remarks which Mr. Marler would make at the second reading of the Bill would be circulated for comments by other interested Ministers (and possibly by some of the officials concerned).

3. In connection with the first of these steps we recommended that you should support acceptance in principle of the proposal which Mr. Marler was making for an amendment to the Act. This apparently was the attitude of other Ministers concerned and Mr. Marler's recommendation was accordingly approved by Cabinet. To the best of our knowledge the other two steps were never taken. We were not consulted on the text of Bill 212. We also were not informed of the nature of the explanatory remarks which Mr. Marler would make in the House.

4. We have now examined the Bill and find that it carries out quite satisfactorily the purposes which we had in mind.

5. We have spoken with the Deputy Minister of Transport concerning the statement which Mr. Marler will make and we have been told that while Mr. Marler would be rather sensitive about showing the text at the present stage to officials, Mr. Baldwin would recommend to Mr. Marler that he show it to you personally before the second reading takes place. Mr. Baldwin gave us orally a sketch of what he had proposed Mr. Marler should say but he added that Mr. Marler might well revise his draft very considerably. If Mr. Marler does not speak with you in the next day or so concerning these remarks you might wish to express to him your interest in them. You might point out that the subject of control over "External Submarine Cables" is a subject of some concern to the Department of External Affairs. You might also indicate to him, as we have mentioned to Mr. Baldwin, that you have been receiving various formal and informal representations on this subject from Mr. Maclaren and others. You might also wish to emphasize that there is a danger of the discussion on this Bill taking an anti-American turn in view of the current tendency for debates on most subjects to be given this kind of a twist. Since part of the purpose of this amendment is to prevent "domination" by United States companies of the Canadian external communications field, this Bill would be a fairly natural peg on which to hang some further expressions of anti-American sentiment. You might urge Mr. Marler to have this

No. 269 Ottawa, April 23, 1956

The Ambassador of the United States of America presents his compliments to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has the honor to refer to Bill 212, An Act to Amend the Telegraphs Act.

Bill 212 was introduced in the House of Commons of Canada on April 12, 1956 by the Minister of Transport. The amendment is concerned with external submarine cables and would require that such cables be licensed and be subject to certain regulations set forth in the bill.

The Department of State has requested the Embassy to express the concern regarding this bill of the United States cable companies operating in Canada, the Commercial Cable Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company. These companies fear that the enactment of the bill would affect existing authorizations under which they now operate in Canada. They fear as well that it might militate against their future operations in Canada where they have always endeavored to furnish satisfactory services and have cooperated fully with the Canadian authorities.

It is hoped that the bill if enacted will contain language which would ensure that the future operations of the United States companies would receive treatment at least as favorable as the treatment given any other cable company operating in Canada.[155]

CHICAGO DIVERSION

When Congress adjourned in August last year, the status of legislation on the Chicago diversion was as follows: Bill H.R. 3210 (introduced by Representative O'Brien of Illinois) had been approved by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Public Works.

2. In the Senate, Senator Dirksen of Illinois introduced Bill S-1772 about midway through the session, and on July 14 he and Senator Douglas, also of Illinois, co-sponsored a second bill, S-2550. S-1772 and S-2550 which were both identical to H.R. 3210 were referred to the Committee on Public Works also. At the end of July Senator Dirksen wrote to the Secretary of State requesting the State Department to examine all aspects of the Chicago diversion in detail while Congress was in adjournment, so that full information would be available to all interested parties when the Senate reconvened.

3. The present situation is as follows. The Senate Committee on Public Works has not yet scheduled hearings on any of the three identical bills that are before it. It is likely that hearings will not be scheduled until the State Department have given Senator Dirksen the information he requested last July. We were told today by the State Department that their reply may be sent fairly soon. We suspect that Senator Dirksen has been in touch with the State Department at either the Secretary or Under-Secretary level about a reply to his letter, and that instructions have been issued in the State Department that the reply is to be sent as soon as possible.

4. As far as the State Department is concerned they have not yet decided whether or not they will oppose legislation aimed at increasing the diversion at Chicago. Their final decision will not be made until their legal advisers have completed the study they have been conducting as a result of Senator Dirksen's letter. We have not been able to obtain any definite information on what the results of that study may be, but we were told today that the study is expected to be completed by the end of this week. When the results of that study are available they will be examined by the State Department's Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, who, taking into account the results of that study and "other relevant circumstances", will recommend a final State Department position. It is expected that the State Department's reply to Senator Dirksen will be sent almost as soon as their own position (which is almost certain to be reflected in their reply) has been decided.

5. As for the tactics to be adopted by Canada, we think it would be wise to make our views known before the State Department send their reply to Senator Dirksen, or, failing that, before the Senate Committee on Public Works begins hearings on any of the bills now before it. The advantage, as we see it, would be that any members of the Committee who are opposed to the diversion would be able to refer to Canada's opposition in support of their attempts to prevent approval of this legislation. If our views are not known, supporters of the bill will almost certainly use the absence of Canadian views (as they did last year) as an indication that Canada no longer is opposed to an increased diversion at Chicago. As you have suggested, our views could be made known by submitting either a formal note or an aide mémoire. We agree that an aide mémoire might serve the purpose. It seems to us, however, that it is possible that a change from a formal note to a less formal aide mémoire might be interpreted in certain quarters as an indication that our views now are not so strong as they were in the past. On balance, therefore, we are inclined to favour a formal note. If you agree, we would propose to deliver to the State Department, at the earliest possible opportunity, a note along the lines of that given in your teletype EX-1339 of July 26.[156] The only change that we might suggest in the text of that note, in order to achieve the transition from a protest based primarily on the possibility of damage to Canadian navigation interests, to a protest based on a possible reduction in power potential, would be to add to it a reference to the fact that in our previous notes, specifically No. 70 of February 1, 1954[157] and No. 169 of March 10, 1954,[158] we pointed out that any increase in the diversion at Chicago would impair the power potential on the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers. This addition might be made by inserting a new second sentence in paragraph 2 of the proposed note. We should be grateful for your views on this suggestion.

When we were discussing this subject with George Vest of the State Department's Canadian Desk today, he told us that one of the "other relevant circumstances" which would be taken into account by the State Department in arriving at their final position, would be the relationship between on the one hand a protest on the increased Chicago diversion and request for compensation for damages done to Canadian power interests and on the other hand a possible similar protest and request for compensation for damages done to United States interests in the lower Columbia River. In Vest's view a Canadian request for compensation in the context of the Chicago diversion would serve to justify a similar United States request for compensation with respect to the Columbia. It was Vest's opinion (and on this his view is subject to change in the light of the State Department's legal division's study) Canada is entitled to protest an increased diversion at Chicago under the terms of paragraph 1 of Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. According to Vest's interpretation this paragraph would give the Hydro Electric Power Corporation of Ontario, for instance, the right to sue the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago for damages in a United States Court. He indicated that there might be some question whether HEPCO would be properly regarded as a Party (with a capital P) or a party (with a small p).

6. Another of the "other relevant circumstances" is the Niagara Treaty of 1950. It is still Vest's view that an increase in the Chicago diversion would be a direct infringement of this treaty, but again this may not be the State Department's final opinion. He indicated that there was some doubt in the State Department whether the amount of water authorized for use for the production of power at Niagara was an absolute and fixed figure, or whether the phrase "less the amount of water used and necessary ..." could be interpreted as permitting an increased diversion at Chicago for domestic and sanitary purposes.

7. With respect to the International Lake Ontario Board of Engineers Interim Report to the International Joint Commission, we are inclined to think that it might be to our advantage to authorize its release. In our view it would be advantageous not to release the report only if we intended to protest again on the grounds of damage to Canadian navigation interest. But since the report seems to make such a protest by Canada impossible, that advantage disappears. Further, if our next protest is to be made on the grounds of reduced power potential in the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers, it seems to us that the evidence in the report showing that the proposed increased diversion at Chicago will result in a substantial loss of power to Canada should become public knowledge. Although we do not know what measures may have been taken to keep the contents of this report confidential, we would be surprised if most of the important information in it is not by now known to all those who are interested in the Chicago diversion.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

There was a full discussion on this subject at yesterday's meeting of the Advisory Committee on Water Uses Policy. The Committee discussed not only the immediate question as to whether or not a note should be sent to the State Department and, if so, what its character should be, but also the question of the validity, under present circumstances, of the attitude which Canada has traditionally adopted on this question. It was pointed out that the present proposal for an experimental three-year diversion of 1,000 cfs is moderate in comparison with the diversions and proposals of the past. The opposition in the United States is apparently becoming less and hence Canadian opposition would stand out more in relief, whereas in the past it was the domestic opposition which largely resulted in the proposal being defeated. It was argued that the additional temporary diversion proposed would not be of great injury to Canadian interests, although the cumulative effect of successive diversions is of consequence.

2. As a result of the discussion, this Department was charged with studying the possibility of proposing negotiations on the whole question to the United States or, alternatively, of proposing a specific reference on a Chicago diversion to the International Joint Commission. Meanwhile, it was agreed that a note should be sent to the State Department. The note should set out the estimated injury to Canadian interests of the diversion following upon past diversions. It should express our opposition to the proposal but in moderate form. It remains for discussion whether the note should quote the treaty and whether it should refer to the question of compensation. A complete record of the discussion is going to you by bag.

3. We are accordingly preparing the text of a new note. We will consult the interested departments and will submit the text to Cabinet for approval. You will appreciate that this will take at least two weeks and that therefore the note will not be delivered as quickly as you would like. We understand your arguments for rapid action but nevertheless think it best to follow the procedure described above. If, meanwhile, the State Department is interested in our views, the latest expression of them is of course, the three notes delivered in 1954.[159] As our proposed note will probably be milder in tone than the 1954 notes, we do not think that our interests will suffer if the State Department takes the 1954 notes for the present as the expression of the Canadian viewpoint.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

My immediately following telegram contains the text of the note for despatch to the State Department. It is based on interdepartmental discussion and has been approved by the Cabinet. From the information you have given us about the consideration of this question in the State Department and in Congress, I presume that you would like to deliver this note immediately. Unless, therefore, you wish to suggest any changes in the text, I would propose that you send this note to the State Department on Monday.

2. The remaining question is that of publicity to be given to the note. The text will be unclassified as soon as it is delivered. On one hand, we do not want to draw great attention to the note. On the other hand, we want to be able to show that we are making representations on legislation which affects Canadian interests. Also, it may be desirable for the State Department to be able to communicate the text of the note to Congress. In 1954 there was some doubt as to the best procedure for releasing the text of the notes on Chicago diversion. In fact, the text of the note of February 1, 1954, was read into the congressional record by Congressman Ostertag on February 2, but it was not tabled in the House of Commons until February 26. Similarly, the note of March 10 was tabled in the House of Commons on March 23. We understand from today's telephone conversation that the note might be more effective in the State Department if no publicity were given to it for some days.

3. We are therefore taking up the question of the release of the text of the note with the Minister. We are proposing that the text should be released sooner or later by tabling in the House of Commons. As in your view the note would be more effective in the State Department if no publicity were given to it for the time being, we propose that this tabling be delayed for the present. The position can be considered if questions are asked in the House or by the press. Meanwhile we presume that if publication of the note in Washington becomes desirable because of congressional consideration of the Chicago diversion bill, you will so inform us.

4. You will notice that the first sentence of the text contains an alternative wording. We should be glad to know the text which you actually use in the first sentence.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

The following is the text of the note for despatch to the State Department. Text begins:

On instruction from my Government, I should like to refer to Bill S-2550 (or S-1772, whichever is appropriate) now before the United States Senate, concerning a proposal to divert water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois waterway for experimental purposes in aid of navigation, for a period of three years, at an annual average rate of 2,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage, an increase of 1,000 cubic feet per second over what is permitted at the present time. Similar bills have been introduced in Congress in the past few years requesting authorization for such an additional diversion to promote navigation and for other purposes.

2. The President of the United States on September 3, 1954, withheld approval from a similar bill submitted for his signature. In his memorandum of disapproval, the President pointed to the fact that the International Joint Commission, following upon a reference by the two governments, was engaged in a study of the levels of Lake Ontario which had a bearing on the question of the diversion at Chicago.[160]

3. The International Joint Commission instructed the International Lake Ontario Board of Engineers to study the effect on Lake Ontario levels of the proposed increased diversion at Chicago of 1,000 cubic feet per second for three years. The Board of Engineers submitted its report to the Commission on June 14, 1955. The report estimated that the increased diversion would lead to a lowering of levels of between one quarter of an inch and five-eighths of an inch at various points in the lower Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River down to the harbour of Montreal. The aggregate total loss of power to actual and planned power developments in Canada which would result from the three year additional diversion was estimated at 310,100,000 k.w. hours over the fifteen years during which the effects of the additional diversion would be felt.

4. If the proposed temporary diversion were adopted, the result would be a total diversion for all purposes at Chicago of approximately 4,200 cubic feet per second. It is estimated that the effect upon the levels of the lower Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River of a total diversion of this size would be a lowering of levels at various points ranging from about two inches to almost three inches. Such a lowering of levels is of significance to navigation, particularly in years when, following the cycle of water supplies in the Great Lakes, very low stages are experienced. Moreover, the estimate of the loss in potential power given in the report of the Board of Engineers represents the effect of the proposed additional diversion only, and does not take into account the cumulative effect of past diversions. Because of the storage characteristics of the Great Lakes, the temporary diversion proposed will not give a real indication to the effects on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin of a permanent diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second. These would be much more considerable than the computed effects of a temporary diversion.

5. I am accordingly instructed to make clear that, in the view of the Canadian Government, the enactment of the proposed legislation would be prejudicial to the navigation and power interests of both countries.[161] Text ends. Message ends.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 9, 1956

CHICAGO DIVERSION

You will recall that a Chicago diversion bill was passed by the House of Representatives last year and it is now before the Senate Public Works Committee. This bill proposes to divert water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for experimental purposes in aid of navigation, for a period of three years, at an annual average rate of 2,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage, an increase of 1,000 cubic feet per second over what is permitted at the present time. As in the past when similar bills have been introduced in Congress, the Canadian Government has formally protested to the United States Government that any further diversion of water at Chicago would be injurious to Canadian power and navigation interests.

2. Mr. Marselis Parsons of the State Department has recently appeared before the Senate Public Works Committee and stated that his department disapproved of this legislation in its present form because it envisaged unilateral action by the United States. He added, [161] Cette note, qui portait le numéro 113, a été envoyée au Département d'État le 13 février 1956. La première phrase de cette note faisait référence à la loi HR-3210, qui était identique aux lois S-2550 et S-1772.

This note, numbered 113, was delivered to the Department of State on February 13, 1956. The first sentence of the note referred to H.R. 3210, which was identical to S-2550 and S-1772.

however, that the State Department would not oppose the legislation if it were amended to provide that the water diversion as set out in the legislation would not take place before a negotiated arrangement with respect to it had been reached — satisfactory to both Canada and the United States.

3. Under the proposed amendment as stated, the Canadian Government would have the right of veto with respect to any water diversion and this fact has obviously not escaped the notice of Senators Dirksen and Douglas from Illinois. Having regard to the stand taken by the State Department, Senator Dirksen informally asked Parsons what the attitude of the Canadian Government would be if the amendment referred to above were made to the proposed legislation. This question in turn was relayed informally to our Embassy.

4. No formal request for an answer to Senator Dirksen's question has been made to our Embassy by the State Department. Having regard, however, to the fact that Mr. Parsons will have to make some reply to the Senator, we could, if you approve, tell the State Department informally what our views are on this matter. The context of our statement might be in line with one of the following alternatives:

(a) The Embassy could say that the Canadian Government has on several occasions in the past (the latest being by Note No. 113 of February 13, 1956) protested the further diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago on the grounds that it was injurious to Canadian power and navigation interests and that its views in this respect have not altered. Nonetheless, if the proposed amendment were made to the legislation, the Canadian Government would be prepared to meet the United States request for negotiations in the hope that some agreement might be reached. The Embassy might indicate to the State Department that in accepting an invitation to negotiate we would be prepared to consider the merits of any proposal made but could obviously not guarantee that an agreement would be reached.[162]

(b) Instead of committing ourselves on this issue our Embassy could say that the question of whether Canada would agree to negotiate if such an amendment were made to the bill is purely hypothetical and could not be answered at this time; a reply could only be given when the Canadian Government had formally received an invitation to negotiate and had an opportunity to study properly its implications.

5. Since a positive statement would likely improve the chances of the amendment receiving approval from both the Senate and the conference of the two houses, I am in favour of adopting alternative (a) above. Admittedly alternative (b) has the advantage of not committing the Canadian government to agree to negotiations and at the same time does not imply refusal to do so if an invitation were forthcoming. It is unlikely, however, that this kind of answer would do anything to help the State Department have the amendment accepted.

6. I am forwarding a copy of this memorandum to the Deputy Minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the information of his Minister. Before commenting on this matter you might wish to discuss it with Mr. Lesage.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 30, 1956

CHICAGO DIVERSION

On July 27 the United States Senate passed Bill H.R. 3210 providing for a temporary diversion of 1,000 c.f.s. of water from Lake Michigan to the Illinois Waterway for experimental purposes in aid of navigation for a period of three years. The bill had previously passed the House of Representatives and has been sent to the White House for Presidential approval.

2. In Note No. 113 of February 13, of which a copy is attached, the Embassy in Washington expressed the views of the Canadian Government on this bill. The note pointed out that according to an International Engineers' Report the proposed temporary diversion for a period of three years would lead to a lowering of water levels of between 1/4" to 5/8" at various points in the lower Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River. When the proposed new diversion is added to existing diversions, the total effect on lake levels is of the order of 2" to 3". Moreover, the loss of potential power resulting from the increased diversion at the existing and planned installations at Niagara and in the St. Lawrence River was estimated at 310,100,000 kilowatt hours over the fifteen years during which the effect of the increased diversion would be felt. The note concluded by expressing the view of the Canadian Government that the enactment of the proposed legislation would be prejudicial to the navigation and power interests of both countries. The note was tabled in the House of Commons on March 8.

3. You will recall that in 1954, when similar legislation was before Congress, we not only sent a note of protest before the Senate had acted on the bill, but we also sent a further note of protest when the bill was sent to the President and that you made a personal intervention with Mr. Robert Anderson, at the time Deputy Secretary of Defence. In a memorandum to Cabinet† dated February 7, which preceded the sending of the note of February 13, it was argued that this year we should not protest but send the United States Government a moderately phrased note simply pointing out the prejudicial effect of the proposed bill on Canadian and United States interests. The arguments advanced for this course in the memorandum to Cabinet were the following:

The fact that the proposed temporary increase of 1,000 c.f.s. is moderate when compared with the large diversions of the past;

the International Engineers' Report, published in 1955, which indicated that the effect on navigation of the proposed additional increase was not consequential;

the decreasing opposition to the measure within the United States; and the possibility that a strongly worded protest in this case might serve as a United States precedent for a protest in case Canada decided to divert the waters of the Columbia, the Kootenay or the Yukon rivers.

4. I accordingly recommend that the Government should take no further action now and that we should maintain that our attitude is adequately expressed in the note of February 13.

5. Should a member direct a question to you at the House this morning, I recommend that you simply refer to the note of February 13, tabled in the House on March 8.[163]

6. There was a likelihood within recent weeks that the bill would be amended to provide for negotiation with Canada before the diversion went into effect. However, the Senate and the House have passed the bill without the proposed amendment.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

You will have seen in this morning's New York Times a report that the President has vetoed the Chicago Diversion legislation (H.R. 3210).[164]

2. I understand from the State Department that the Bureau of the Budget recommended veto action on the basis that not all the information relevant to the question of an increased diversion was available for study at this time. (This is probably a reference to the fact that the I.J.C.'s final report on the effects of an increased diversion and a similar study by the U.S. Corps of Engineers are not yet complete). I understand also that the Bureau of the Budget recommended to the President that his memorandum of disapproval[165] include a request to the State Department to discuss the Chicago Diversion question with Canada, when all the relevant information is available. (This would appear to leave the timing of talks with Canada to be determined by the State Department.)

3. I expect to receive copies of the President's memorandum of disapproval before noon today and will put it on the teletype immediately it is received, in case of questions in the House of Commons.

Note de la Direction de l'Amérique pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from American Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 29, 1957

CHICAGO DIVERSION — AIDE MÉMOIRE

On March 11, 1957, the State Department presented an aide mémoire† to our Embassy in Washington. The aide mémoire made the following points:

(a) A number of identical bills have been introduced at the present session of Congress to authorize an increased diversion at Chicago of 1000 cubic feet per second.

(b) The reason for the proposed legislation is the rapid population growth in the greater Chicago area and the resulting sanitary problem despite construction of filtration plants which are among the most modern in the world.

(c) The proposed legislation would enable the United States Public Health Service to make new field studies over a three-year period in the Illinois waterway in order to evaluate water quality conditions, changes in chemical and bacteriological content, the persistence of aquatic life and other related subjects.

(d) Since an increased diversion would have recognizable effects elsewhere in the Great Lakes basin and St. Lawrence River it might be possible to increase the Long Lac-Ogoki diversions into Lake Superior by a comparable amount during the three-year period of the study.

(e) It is hoped that the Canadian Government will consider the extent to which it may be in Canada's over-all interest to refrain from interposing objection to the proposed legislation. The three-year diversion would result in authorization studies which would make it possible for Canada to weigh more accurately any future proposal for further increased diversions in this area and to decide where Canada's best interests might lie.

(f) Department of State would be pleased to make available representatives of the Corps of Engineers or the Public Health Service to explain in greater detail the Corps report or the health studies.

2. With respect to (e), our Embassy understands that State Department has two things in mind. In the first place, there are United States opponents to the legislation who have permitted in the past and are now permitting Canada to bear the brunt of responsibility for opposition, i.e. making Canada "the whipping boy". In the second place, if an epidemic should break out in Chicago the blame, wherever it might properly lie, would be placed upon Canada as the foremost opponent of the increased diversion.

3. A meeting was held with representatives of the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario and their respective hydro-electric commissions. Both spoke in the strongest terms against permitting any further diversion at Chicago if in any way it could be avoided. In addition, Ontario representatives stated that there is no additional water available at Long Lac-Ogoki.

4. The Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy has considered what action should be taken and has recommended that we accept the United States offer to have representatives of the Corps of Engineers and the Public Health Service explain matters to us. The Committee felt that more of the opposition should come from the states bordering the Great Lakes and from the Power Authority of the State of New York.

5. The attached draft aide mémoire states that the suggested additional diversion at Long Lac-Ogoki is not feasible. It further states that we would be pleased to have the representatives of the Crops of Engineers and the Public Health Service explain matters to us. In this connection, I would suggest that we invite representatives of the two provinces to be present at such meetings.

6. In addition, I feel that our aide mémoire should warn the United States now that an additional diversion at Chicago will cause us injury and that we consider that we have certain rights. In the attached draft, these rights are not spelled out as this would seem to be an inappropriate time to argue our position. However, what I have in mind are (a) Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty, which states that we do not surrender any right to object to interference with these waters, (b) the Treaty of Washington, which provides for free and open navigation on Lake Michigan, and (c) the criteria approved by the two Governments for the operation of the regulatory works now being built in the International Rapids Section of the St. Lawrence River. Some members of the Advisory Committee may not be inclined to take such a strong stand at the present time. My own feeling is that we cannot appear to send a weak response after strong representations have been made to us by the provinces concerned. Furthermore, I feel that we should alert the United States Government if in fact we intend in our substantive reply to object to the proposed additional diversion at Chicago.

7. Legislation similar to that now proposed has been vetoed twice by President Eisenhower. What will happen this year we cannot foretell. However, unless we indicate clearly that we have strong views on the subject I fear that any possibility of a third veto will be greatly diminished.

8. The real concern, of course, is not with respect to the current proposal to divert 1000 cubic feet per second for a period of three years. The fear is that this is merely the camel's head in the tent and that in succeeding years more and more water will be diverted. I would hope that at some stage we might get the Americans to see the necessity for an agreement binding Chicago in perpetuity to a maximum diversion which might even be tied in to the generally prevailing levels of the Great Lakes which, as you know, are subject to substantial cyclical fluctuations. This view, it must be stressed, is entirely personal and has not been discussed in the Advisory Committee.

9. If you agree, I shall circulate the attached draft to the Advisory Committee for comments before having it done in final form. In view of the interim nature of this note, I assume it will not be necessary to obtain ministerial approval before despatch.

J.H. CLEVELAND

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet d'un aide mémoire

Draft Aide Mémoire

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 29, 1957

State Department aide mémoire of March 11, 1957, requested early consideration by the Canadian authorities of the problems raised by H.R. 2 and other proposed legislation before the United States Congress concerning an increased diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois waterway.

2. With respect to the suggestion that the Government of Canada should examine the possibility of increasing the Long Lac-Ogoki diversion into Lake Superior to counteract the effects of the diversion at Chicago, the Province of Ontario has been consulted. It is regretted that such a compensating increase is not possible since virtually all the flow from the Albany River system is already being diverted into Lake Superior.

3. As is pointed out in the aide mémoire, an increased diversion out of Lake Michigan would have recognizable effects elsewhere in the Great Lakes basin and in the St. Lawrence River. The foreseeable effects of such a diversion necessarily occasion concern to the Government of Canada. An increased diversion from Lake Michigan at Chicago will inevitably cause injury to navigation and to hydro-electric generation with respect to both of which matters there exist international obligations between the United States and Canada.

4. In order that full consideration may be given to the problems raised by the proposed United States legislation, the Government of Canada would be pleased to have representatives of the Corps of Engineers and of the United States Public Health Service meet with representatives of the appropriate departments of government in Canada to explain in greater detail both the Corps of Engineers' recent report and the studies which would be carried out under the proposed legislation.

CHICAGO DIVERSION

1. Copies of a draft aide-mémoire, prepared by External Affairs and suggested as a preliminary reply to the United States aide-mémoire of March 11, 1957, were distributed. The Committee revised the draft: the revision is attached hereto as an appendix. Several members thought that the wording of the unrevised draft might encourage the Americans to discuss problems other than sanitation, whereas this was the matter on which Canada wanted clarification. They felt that there should be strong emphasis on it. Moreover, it would be in line with previous Canadian policy to encourage all the "anti-diversionist" elements in the U.S.A. to fight the measure by pointing out the adverse effects on navigation and power on both sides of the boundary in addition to asking for a full explanation of the sanitation needs of Greater Chicago. Some members thought that to "express concern" about the diversion's "inevitable effects" on Canadian interests might be to suggest a new interpretation of Article II of the Treaty of 1909, and thus to imply the existence of limitations on the right to divert. If applied to the Columbia as well as to Lake Michigan, such an interpretation would be against Canada's interests. Canadian power interests in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin, however extensive, were small if compared with Canadian interests on the Columbia River. Other members thought that some concern had to be indicated to avoid giving the impression in the United States that Canada, by remaining silent, had approved the increased diversion. The revised wording achieved a compromise between these two viewpoints.

2. Mr. Côté reported that Mr. Duncan, Chairman of Ontario Hydro, understood the federal position against a formal protest by Canada, and thought that, if the legislation became law in the U.S.A., the best course of action for Ontario Hydro would be to seek redress in U.S. courts.

3. The Committee decided not to send copies of the aide-mémoire to the Ontario and Quebec governments immediately but agreed that it should be dispatched to Washington without delay.

[APPENDICE/APPENDIX]

Projet d'un aide-mémoire

Draft Aide Mémoire

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 30, 1957

State Department aide-mémoire of March 11, 1957, requested early consideration by the Canadian authorities of the problems raised by H.R. 2 and other proposed legislation before the United States Congress concerning an increased diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois waterway.

2. With respect to the suggestion that the Government of Canada should examine the possibility of increasing the Long Lac-Ogoki diversion into Lake Superior to counteract the effects of the diversion at Chicago, the Province of Ontario has been consulted. It is regretted that such a compensating increase is not possible since virtually all the flow from the Albany River system above the point of diversion is already being diverted into Lake Superior.

3. As is pointed out in the aide-mémoire, an increased diversion out of Lake Michigan would have recognizable effects elsewhere in the Great Lakes basin and in the St. Lawrence River. The foreseeable effects of such a diversion necessarily occasion concern because, as is set out in the Canadian Note #113 of February 13, 1956, there would be injury to navigation and to hydro-electric generation in both countries.

4. The Government of Canada would be pleased to have representatives of the United States explain in greater detail to representatives of Canada the sanitation problems of the Chicago area and the studies which would be carried out under the proposed legislation.[166]

POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

In 1946 the Governments of Canada and the United States referred the complex problem of the pollution of boundary waters to the International Joint Commission[167] and in October, 1950, the Commission presented to both governments a detailed report of its findings concerning the pollution in:

(1) The St. Marys River;

(2) The St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair and the Detroit River; and

(3) The Niagara River.

The Commission found that the boundary waters and tributaries leading to the boundary waters were being polluted on each side of the boundary to an extent injurious to health and property, contrary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. Eighteen Canadian and forty-three United States municipalities were mentioned in the report as causing such pollution of boundary waters. The principal Ontario municipalities were: Sault Ste. Marie, Sarnia, Chatham, Windsor, Fort Erie, Niagara Falls and Welland. The main causes of water pollution were domestic sewage and industrial waste, and it was considered by the Commission that those responsible for the pollution, i.e., municipalities, industries, vessel owners, etc., should bear the cost of the necessary remedial measures. At 1950 prices, it was estimated that proper treatment measures for the eighteen Canadian municipalities would cost $25,000,000, while Canadian industries in the areas under reference would need to expend $3,450,000. On the United States side, proper treatment installations for United States municipalities and industries would cost $76,500,000 and $22,650,000 respectively.

2. The International Joint Commission report recommended that certain "Objectives for Boundary Waters Quality Control" be adopted by the two governments to keep the waters in a satisfactory condition, that the remedial measures necessary to maintain this satisfactory condition be put into effect and, finally, that the International Joint Commission be authorized by the two governments to maintain supervision of boundary waters pollution. The United States Government approved the report and the recommendations in December of 1950, while the Canadian Government, following approval by the Cabinet in October, 1951, took the same action in November, 1951.[168]

3. In March, 1952, the International Joint Commission established two Technical Advisory Boards on the Pollution of Boundary Waters. Since this date, these boards in their periodical reports have found that industries in Canada have made considerable progress in abating water pollution, but that industries on the United States side continue to be delinquent although, as far as is known, not in such a manner as to have a dangerous effect on health. The Canadian municipalities named in the report, however, have made little progress. Representatives of the State of Michigan, appearing before the International Joint Commission in April, 1954, criticized Ontario municipalities (in particular Sarnia, Windsor and Sault Ste. Marie) for their failure to take definite steps to prevent boundary waters pollution. On July 14 of the same year the United States Government protested the dumping of raw sewage into boundary waters and specifically mentioned the three municipalities referred to above.

4. General McNaughton, Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 23, 1954, and reported that Ontario municipalities were making little, if any, progress towards the solution of this very serious problem. He requested that the Canadian Government bring the gravity of the situation, with its possible breach of the Treaty, to the attention of the Government of Ontario. The Prime Minister wrote to Premier Frost in November, 1954, expressing his belief that the abatement of boundary waters pollution was a concern of the province and of the municipalities.[169] In his reply, Premier Frost stated that the problem was extremely complex and, although Ontario would do what was feasible, some form of federal-provincial fiscal arrangement would be necessary.[170] However, in his reply of March 24, 1955, to this letter, the Prime Minister rejected this proposal by stating that "the abatement of pollution of boundary waters cannot usefully be considered within the context of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements".[171] On the credit side of the ledger, it should be noted that the Minister of Health of Ontario stated in July, 1954, that all municipalities in Ontario would be required to have final engineering plans for sewage treatment plants ready for the letting of contracts by July 1, 1957.

5. The most recent protest from the United States was made at the International Joint Commission meeting in October, 1955. Representatives from the State of Michigan, supported by the United States Section of the International Joint Commission, claimed that Michigan municipalities could not continue their efforts to abate boundary waters pollution until assurances were received from the Canadian municipalities that they will also undertake measures to stop the pollution which they were causing. Unless some solution is reached, this problem will presumably be discussed in future semi-annual meetings of the Commission.

6. Although the report of 1950 stated that the Canadian and United States municipalities were actually polluting boundary waters to the injury of health and property to the United States and Canadian sides of the boundary (and therefore contrary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909), it might be difficult to prove in a particular case before a court of law that a discharge of sewage originating in Canada does in fact cause injury to health or property on the United States side. However, by accepting the recommendations and objectives of the International Joint Commission report of 1950, it seems that Canada has assumed at least a moral obligation to see that appropriate steps are taken to abate the pollution of boundary waters by municipalities, particularly in the light of the progress made in Michigan.

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submits this memorandum for information only. No recommendations are submitted pending the outcome of a study by the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy on the general question of pollution of waters throughout Canada.[172]

FEDERAL JURISDICTION CONCERNING POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

The problem of the pollution of boundary waters has been of special concern to the United States and Canada since 1950. An engineers' report to the International Joint Commission found that both countries were polluting boundary waters to an extent injurious to health and property on the other side of the boundary, contrary to the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. Since 1950, United States and Canadian industries have been able to control their pollution, but the various municipalities mentioned in the report, particularly those in Canada, have taken few definite steps to abate the pollution which they are causing.

2. The Government of Canada, mindful of its international obligations under the Treaty, has attempted to persuade the Province of Ontario and, through it, the municipalities concerned, to abate this pollution of boundary waters by the construction of sewage treatment facilities. This policy of persuasion has had no significant results.

3. We should now like to obtain an opinion on the capacity of the Parliament of Canada to legislate in performance of Canadian obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty in order to control or prevent pollution of boundary waters. I would appreciate it if you would answer the following questions:

(1) Can the Parliament of Canada legislate to implement Article IV, paragraph 2, of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 to prevent or control pollution of Canadian boundary waters, or waters flowing across the boundary, to the injury of health or property on the United States side?

(2) If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, can the Parliament of Canada legislate in particular to require Canadian municipalities to take effective measures to prevent or control such pollution, i.e., pollution contrary to Article IV, paragraph 2, of the Boundary Waters Treaty?

4. I attach for your information a copy of a memorandum dated February 13, 1956, on the pollution of boundary waters which has been submitted to Cabinet by Mr. Pearson.

5. As this matter will arise at the April meeting of the International Joint Commission, it would be helpful if I could have your reply by the end of March.

6. This letter has been drafted following discussion in the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy. We understand that the Department of National Health and Welfare will be asking you for an opinion on the jurisdiction of Parliament to deal with water pollution generally. Our questions, however, are limited to pollution within the meaning of the Boundary Waters Treaty.

Dear Sir:

FEDERAL JURISDICTION CONCERNING POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

Further to your letter of the 14th ultimo, and subsequent telephone conversations between your Mr. Rogers and Miss Ritchie of this Department, I have to advise that this matter has now received consideration.

I understand that you desire my opinion on the following questions:

1. Can the Parliament of Canada legislate to implement Article IV, paragraph 2, of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 to prevent or control pollution of Canadian boundary waters, or waters flowing across the boundary, to the injury of health or property on the United States side?

2. If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, can the Parliament of Canada legislate in particular to require Canadian municipalities to take effective measures to prevent or control such pollution, i.e., pollution contrary to Article IV, paragraph 2 of the Boundary Waters Treaty?

I am of the opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. The generality of the power vested in Parliament to legislate for the Peace, Order and Good Government of Canada is, in my opinion, adequate to implement the obligation of Canada referred to by you.

With reference to the second question as to whether Parliament can require municipalities to take effective measures to prevent or control pollution of boundary waters in breach of Article IV, I should need to have more information as to the substance of the legislative proposal. Although Parliament could neither compel a municipality to enact by-laws to prevent pollution, nor require the municipality to adopt a method of treating its sewage, I am satisfied that Parliament could forbid pollution generally of boundary waters and provide sanctions for the enforcement of such a law. Parliament could by appropriate legislation, therefore, prevent a municipality or any other corporation or person from allowing untreated sewage or harmful wastes to pollute the boundary waters.

Yours truly,

F.P. VARCOE

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au premier ministre de l'Ontario

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Premier of Ontario

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 18, 1956

Dear Premier Frost:

You will recall that in 1946 the governments of Canada and the United States referred the problem of the pollution of boundary waters to the International Joint Commission. The studies made by the Commission, with the assistance of Ontario officials, were concerned with the waters of the St. Mary's River, the St. Clair River, Lake St. Clair, the Detroit River, and the Niagara River. Good progress is being made in this matter on both sides of the boundary.

I have now been informed by the United States Embassy that the Governors of the States adjoining Lakes Erie and Ontario and the International Section of the St. Lawrence River have recently recommended to the Department of State that a reference be made to the International Joint Commission for the control of pollution of these boundary waters, similar in nature to that which exists for the rivers connecting the Great Lakes. The recommendation of the Governors is made, in part, in the light of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power project and the anticipated industrial development of this area.

The Government of the United States appears to be favorably disposed to the proposed extension of the Commission's pollution investigations and has invited the Canadian Government to join the United States in referring this matter to the Commission. While the existing 1946 reference to the Commission might be amended to include Lakes Ontario and Erie and the International Section of the St. Lawrence River, the United States view is that a new reference might be preferable since the studies and the establishment of water quality objectives have already been completed under the earlier reference.

I am forwarding to you a copy of the draft of a new reference proposed by the United States. At the present moment, this matter is being given preliminary study by officials of the Federal Government, and it is thought that in due course consultations might take place between Federal and Provincial authorities on the reply which might be made to the United States Government.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

DRAFT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION REFERENCE REGARDING POLLUTION OF LAKE ERIE, LAKE ONTARIO AND THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY PORTION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

I have the honor to inform you that the Governments of the United States and Canada have been informed that the waters of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and the international boundary portion of the St. Lawrence River are being polluted by sewage and industrial waste emptied into these waters. Having in mind the provision of Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty signed January 11, 1909, that boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury to health or property on the other side, the two Governments have agreed upon a joint Reference of the matter to the International Joint Commission, pursuant to the provisions of Article IX of said Treaty. The Commission is requested to inquire and to report to the two Governments upon the following questions:

(1) Are the waters of Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and the international boundary portion of the St. Lawrence River actually being polluted on either side of the boundary to the injury of health or property on the other side of the boundary?

(2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, to what extent, by what causes, and in what localities is such pollution taking place?

(3) If the Commission should find that pollution of the character just referred to is taking place, what measures for remedying the situation would, in its judgment, be most practicable from the economic, sanitary and other points of view?

(4) If the Commission should find that the construction or maintenance of remedial or preventive works is necessary to render the waters sanitary and suitable for domestic and other uses, it should indicate the nature, location and extent of such works, and the probable costs thereof, and by whom and in what proportions such cost should be borne.

For the purpose of assisting the Commission in making the investigation and recommendations provided for in this Reference, the two Governments will, upon request, make available to the Commission the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of their governmental agencies, and such information and technical data as may have been acquired by such agencies or as may be acquired by them during the course of the investigation.

The Commission should submit its report and recommendations to the two Governments as soon as practicable.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au premier ministre de l'Ontario

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Premier of Ontario

Ottawa, April 27, 1957

My dear Premier:

In 1954 the Government of the United States requested the Canadian Government to join in a reference to the International Joint Commission, under Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, directing the Commission to make an investigation of the alleged pollution by industrial wastes of Rainy River in the vicinity of International Falls, Minnesota and Fort Frances. This pollution, it was claimed, was having injurious effects upon fish life and consequently affecting the use of the river for fishing.

I have now been informed by the Ambassador of the United States that the Government of the United States desire to renew its suggestion for a reference to the International Joint Commission in the light of recent complaints which it has received alleging that the presence of pollutants in the waters of Rainy River and the Lake of the Woods is posing a threat to fish life in these waters.

You will recall that in my letter to you of July 24, 1954 I explained that it was the view of the Canadian Government that a Reference to the International Joint Commission on the alleged pollution of Rainy River, as requested by the United States, would be advantageous to both countries. At the same time, any arrangements for such a reference can only be effected through the close co-operation of the provincial and federal authorities concerned.

In the light of the foregoing I should be grateful if you would let me know whether the Province of Ontario would have any objection to a reference to the International Joint Commission of the subject outlined in paragraph two.

Yours sincerely,

POLLUTION OF BOUNDARY WATERS

Since officials of the Ontario Government will be here on Monday, it may be an opportunity for you to mention to Dr. Berry the problems in connection with the two proposed references on pollution which we have received from the United States.

2. As you know the United States proposed reference on Lake Ontario, Lake Erie and the international section of the St. Lawrence River was received last October. A letter was sent to Premier Frost regarding this matter on October 18; this letter was signed by Mr. Pearson. An interim answer† was received from Mr. W.M. McIntyre, Secretary of the Cabinet on October 31, 1956. On November 28, 1956 we wrote to Mr. McIntyre and attached to this letter our proposed revisions† of the United States reference. Since no reply was forthcoming we wrote again to Mr. McIntyre on January 14, 1957 and asked if he could inform us how the matter stood. As you know we have had no further communication with Ontario. We have, of course, endeavoured to resurrect this subject through Mr. J.R. Menzies of the Department of National Health and Welfare who is in frequent communication with Dr. Berry. Although Dr. Berry has been anxious to help he has, unfortunately, not received any direction from either the Secretary of the Cabinet or his Minister.

3. With regard to the United States proposed reference on water pollution in Rainy River and Lake of the Woods, we are also awaiting word from the Province of Ontario. I should point out, however, that although the letter to Premier Frost left this Division approximately April 18, it was apparently not signed by the Minister, for obvious reasons, until April 27. Obviously, there has been no opportunity for Premier Frost to give his comments in regard to this reference.

4. Dr. Berry will undoubtedly be informed concerning the first reference and I do not think we need to do anything more than ask if he could do something about obtaining the Provincial Government's views on it. He may not, however, be informed on the later United States proposal and I am, therefore, attaching a copy of the United States Note which you could show him when you bring this matter to his attention.

PASSAMAQUODDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT

Under Public Law No. 401 of the 84th Congress, which was approved by the President on January 31, 1956, the United States Senate and House of Representatives requested that the Secretary of State arrange for the International Joint Commission to conduct a survey of the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project. Subsequently, in Note No. 212 of February 24, 1956,† the United States Ambassador asked for the Canadian Government's view on whether it wished to participate in the proposed survey and, if so, whether it would wish to share in the costs of the survey.

2. The terms of the reference as proposed in Public Law No. 401 are: to arrange for a final survey to be made to determine the cost of construction of the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project at Passamaquoddy Bay; to determine whether or not such cost would allow hydro-electric power to be produced at a price that is economically feasible; and to determine what contribution such a project would make to the national economy and to national defence. These terms appear to be satisfactory as far as Canada is concerned except that no mention is made of determining what effect the project would have upon the fishing industry. It is therefore considered that any references which is jointly made by our two countries would have to include a reference to a fisheries survey in the area.

3. It will be recalled that a similar approach to the Canadian Government was made by the United States Government in December 1952. The Canadian Government in its reply (March 1953) declined to join in a reference on the grounds that there was no evidence to indicate that power in the large quantities and at the relatively high costs to be expected in the tidal power scheme would find or attract markets in the New Brunswick area in the near future. The project was, therefore, considered uneconomic, since a tidal power scheme of this scale would necessitate very large initial capital expenditures, and a large market would be required immediately to bear the carrying charges on the whole initial capital outlay. Further, it was believed that the Passamaquoddy tidal power project might have a serious adverse effect upon the fishing industry.

4. In discussing the latest invitation of the United States Government, the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy considered that the courses of action open to the Canadian Government were as follows:

(a) Refuse the invitation of the United States Government to join in the reference on the grounds that the scheme was impracticable; or

(b) Accept the invitation to join in the reference and share equally with the United States Government in the costs of the survey; or

(c) Accept the invitation to join in the reference but not share in any costs; or

(d) Accept the invitation to join in the reference and share only in the relatively small costs involved in the studies which will have to be made on the effect of the project on the fishing industry. (In the International Joint Commission Report of October 20, 1950, the cost of the fish survey was estimated at $300,000, to be spent over a three-year period.)

5. The Committee considered that to refuse to join the United States in the reference would lay the Canadian Government open to the charge of lack of cooperation, not only by United States interests but also by certain New Brunswick interests. A natural consequence of a Canadian refusal to participate would be for the United States Government to make a unilateral reference to the International Joint Commission, which is legally possible. There has never been a unilateral reference and one on the Passamaquoddy would establish an unfortunate precedent. Having regard, however, to the studies made previously by the Canadian Government on this matter and there being no evidence to show that the tidal project is any more practicable in 1956 than in 1953, the Committee was reluctant to suggest that Canada should participate in the survey at an approximate cost of $1,500,000. For this reason, the Committee considered that Canada should accept the invitation of the United States to join in the reference, but participate in the costs only to the extent of accepting a share of the expenditure involved in any studies connected with the fisheries (alternative (d) above). Canada would, of course, pay the expenditures incidental to the attendance at meetings of the Canadian members of any international boards established by the International Joint Commission, and to any Canadian investigation and studies, should such be required in Canada's interests for clarification of reports and findings of the United States agencies. In joining the reference under these conditions, the Canadian Government would agree to facilitate the extension into Canada of the required surveys by the United States Government agencies and entrance into Canadian territory of the appropriate United States officials on the understanding that all information obtained on the project by the United States agencies would be made currently available to Canada through the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission.

6. It is believed that the above plan would be acceptable to the United States Government since a similar scheme for Canadian participation was suggested by the United States in its note of December 1952. Moreover, section 5 of Public Law No. 401 reads as follows:

"There is authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $3,000,000 to carry out this joint resolution, and any sum appropriated pursuant to this section shall be included in any determination of the proportionate share of the cost of construction of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project to be borne by the United States."

Recommendation:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, recommends:

(a) that the Canadian Government accept the invitation of the United States Government to join in a reference to the International Joint Commission to arrange for a final survey to be made of the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project, on the understanding that in joining the reference, the Canadian Government makes no commitment for the eventual construction of the project;

(b) that the only contribution of the Canadian Government towards the costs of the survey will be for part of the fisheries investigation and for expenses incidental to the joint nature of this investigation, on the assumption that all the other costs of the survey will be borne by the United States Government, and that the expenditures of both governments for the survey will be included in their share of the cost of the construction of the project in the unlikely event that it is decided to proceed with it.[173]

JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION FOR THE PASSAMAQUODDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT

At the meeting of the Cabinet on March 22, it was agreed that Canada should join with the United States in a reference to the International Joint Commission for a survey of the desirability and feasibility of the proposed Passamaquoddy Tidal Power Project.

The terms of the reference have been discussed interdepartmentally and also with the United States Government through the United States Embassy here in Ottawa.

The attached draft reference has the approval of the interested Canadian departments of Government and it is understood that it will also have the approval of the United States Government.

Recommendation

The Secretary of State for External Affairs recommends that the enclosed draft reference be approved and that, as soon as official approval is received from the United States Government, the reference be submitted to the International Joint Commission.

CONFIDENTIAL

JOINT CANADIAN-UNITED STATES REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON THE PASSAMAQUODDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT

In accordance with the provisions of Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of January 11, 1909, the Governments of Canada and the United States have agreed to refer and do hereby refer to the International Joint Commission the following matters for joint examination and advisory report, including conclusions and recommendations:

(a) It is desired that the Commission determine the estimated cost of developing the international tidal power potential of Passamaquoddy Bay in the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick, and determine whether such cost would allow hydroelectric power to be produced at a price which is economically feasible;

(b) The Commission is requested to determine the effects, beneficial or otherwise, which such a power project might have on the local and national economies in the United States and Canada and, to this end, to study specifically the effects which the construction, maintenance and operation of the tidal power structures might have upon the fisheries in the area.

2. In the discharge of its responsibilities under this reference the Commission is requested to review and, in so far as is practicable, make advantageous use of existing reports and plans such as the Report of March 15, 1950, submitted by the International Passamaquoddy Engineering Board to the Commission and the supplemental report of May 1952 prepared by the United States Army Corps of Engineers on the details of estimate of cost of a comprehensive investigation of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. Having regard to the foregoing, the Commission should determine the most desirable general project design from the viewpoint of the public interest in United States and Canada respectively — such design to include plans for structure and appurtenant works in sufficient detail to form the basis of dependable cost estimates and considerations of economic feasibility.

3. In the conduct of its investigations, and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this reference, the Commission may utilize the services of specially qualified engineers and other experts of the technical agencies of the United States and Canada and will, so far as possible, make use of any pertinent data that may be available in such agencies or which may become available during the course of the investigations, thus avoiding duplication of effort and unnecessary expense.

4. The United States Government is willing to incur costs in connection with this survey up to $3 million, and the Canadian Government is willing to incur costs up to $300,000. Each Government has the right to participate at its own expense in all aspects of the survey to an extent appropriate with its interests. In making administrative arrangements for the necessary surveys and studies, the Commission should give suitable effect to these responsibilities.

5. The costs incurred by the Governments of the United States and Canada respectively under this reference will be credited against the costs to be borne by each of the Governments in the event that the project should be constructed as a joint undertaking by the two Governments. The decision of the two Governments to refer this study to the Commission does not imply any commitment regarding the eventual construction of the project.

6. It is the desire of both Governments that the Commission endeavour to complete its various surveys, investigations, studies and other activities under the Reference within a three-year period. Upon completion, it is requested that the Commission prepare and submit to the Governments of the United States and Canada a comprehensive report covering the subject matter of this Reference. The Commission's report should include the details of the specific design, cost estimates and an estimate of the benefits to be derived or the losses to result from this project.[174]

MID-WESTERN WATERSHED REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

You will recall that last week you approved and signed the attached draft memorandum informing the Cabinet of the termination of the Mid-Western Watershed Reference, but not recommending any action. This memorandum had received the concurrence of both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

2. It appears, however, that at the Cabinet meeting on January 5, the Minister of Agriculture presented a memorandum† (also attached) in which mention was made that the Mid-Western Watershed Reference had been terminated. This Department was not consulted about the memorandum of the Minister of Agriculture. It is my understanding that Cabinet action was deferred on this memorandum, but since it revealed the present status of this Reference, it might be considered unnecessary to forward to Cabinet the memorandum prepared by this Department.

3. Despite the unfortunate timing in the submission of these two memoranda, I am of the view that since this is only the second time in the history of the International Joint Commission that the two sections of the Commission have found it necessary to submit separate reports to their respective governments, the information contained in our memorandum should be given to the Cabinet. Therefore, if you approve, arrangements will be made to submit our memorandum, as signed by you, to Cabinet as quickly as possible.[175]

MID-WESTERN WATERSHED REFERENCE TO THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Under date of September 17, 1955, the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission presented its Report (see Annex) to the Government of Canada relating to the Mid-Western Watershed Reference (No. 1), 12 January, 1948. A separate report to the Canadian Government by the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission was mandatory under Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, because the Commission was evenly divided on national lines upon the Reference mentioned above. It is a matter of regret that agreement between the Canadian and United States Sections was not possible, since this is only the second time in the long history of the International Joint Commission that the two Sections of the Commission have found it necessary to submit separate reports to their respective governments.

2. After engineering studies and investigations had been made, the Canadian Section concluded that no practicable, beneficial use of the Waterton and Belly waters within the United States could be made, despite United States claims that a dam in Waterton Lake and a diversion tunnel through the adjacent mountains was possible. The Canadian view was that the tremendous cost of such a tunnel precluded any possibility of the scheme being carried out. Accordingly, in the view of the Canadian Commissioners, no recommendation for apportionment of the waters could be made under the terms of the Reference and so far as Canada was concerned, action on the Reference was, therefore, completed.

3. In order to assist the United States, however, by making water available to irrigate some 70,000 acres in Montana, the Canadian Section offered to the United States Section, as a neighbourly act, a proposal outside the terms of the Reference. This proposal, which had the prior approval of the Canadian Ministers concerned and the Alberta Government, was put forward at the semi-annual meeting of the International Joint Commission on April 1, 1952. The Canadian proposal, which was offered in the form of a draft treaty, contained an offer to transport through Canada waters already apportioned to the United States by the International Joint Commission's St. Mary and Milk Rivers Order of 1921, but which the United States had not been able to use for lack of storage and transportation facilities, as well as certain waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers which Canada could make available without injury to her own interests. Under this proposal, Canada would construct and operate the canals and other works provided the United States would pay for any capital expenditures and operating costs incurred on behalf of that country.

4. A counter proposal was submitted at the semi-annual meeting of the International Joint Commission in October 1952, by the United States Section which provided that a superior right to half the flow of the Waterton and Belly waters entering Canada would be granted to the United States, and "conveyance, storage, regulations and delivery, without cost and without loss of water" would be provided by Canada. The Canadian Section did not admit the basis for any such right and accordingly this proposal was not acceptable to the Canadian Section.

5. Further studies on this Reference and on these proposals were made in 1953 and 1954. In March, 1955, the State of Montana placed before the Commission a proposal that since the Waterton and Belly rivers rise in the United States, then Montana was entitled to 50% of the flow of these waters, and in consideration of an agreement by the United States to relinquish these waters an equivalent amount should be diverted from the St. Mary River for use in the United States. The Canadian view was that the principle enunciated by the State of Montana was not in accordance with the Reference of 1948, or with international law as expressed in the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.

6. At an executive meeting of the International Joint Commission in April 1955, it was apparent that the divergence of opinion between the Canadian and United States Sections on the Reference could not be reconciled. The Canadian Commissioners remained convinced that there was no plan which would be practicable in the public interest to enable the United States to use the Waterton and Belly waters within its boundaries. Furthermore, it appeared from the conduct of the United States Commissioners that the United States claim to the waters of the Waterton and Belly rivers was not made solely because of a belief that these waters could be used in any practicable way in Montana, but perhaps also because it was hoped that the claim to these waters might be used as a lever to re-open the St. Mary and Milk Rivers settlement of 1921.

7. Since this Reference is now terminated, there is no legal obstacle to prevent the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration from carrying out its plans for works in Canada on the Waterton and Belly Rivers, which have been held in abeyance while this matter was before the International Joint Commission.

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, makes this submission for information only. It is not thought necessary or desirable to make any recommendations on this matter at this time.

Dear Sir:

I enclose copy of report to the Government of Canada by the Canadian members of the International Joint Commission, pursuant to the final paragraph of Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, relating to the Mid-Western Watershed Reference (No. 1), 12 January, 1948, signed at Regina, Saskatchewan, on 17 September 1955.

Rapport des membres canadiens de la Commission mixte internationale pour le Gouvernement du Canada

Report from Canadian Members of International Joint Commission to Government of Canada

FINAL PARAGRAPH OF ARTICLE IX OF THE BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY OF 1909 RELATING TO THE MID-WESTERN WATERSHED REFERENCE (NO. 1)
12 JANUARY, 1948

Under date of 12 January, 1948, the Governments of Canada and the United States submitted a Reference to the International Joint Commission in accordance with Article IX of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 11 January, 1909. The International Joint Commission under the terms of the Reference was directed to examine and report on the following matters, namely:

"(1) To investigate and report on the water requirements arising out of the existing dams and other works or projects located in the waters which are of common interest along, across, or in the vicinity of the international boundary from the Continental Divide on the west up to and as far as the western limit of the St. Mary River drainage basin on the east.

(2) To report whether in the judgment of the Commission further uses of these waters within their respective boundaries by Canada and the United States would be practicable in the public interest from the points of view of the two Governments.

(3) Having regard to the reports made under paragraphs 1 and 2, to make advisory recommendations concerning the apportionment which should be made between Canada and the United States of such of the waters under reference as cross the international boundary.

(4) To conduct necessary investigations and to prepare a comprehensive plan or plans of mutual advantage to the two countries for the conservation, control, and utilization of the waters under reference in accordance with the recommended apportionment thereof."

The only rivers affected by the terms of reference are the Waterton and Belly Rivers, both of which rise in the State of Montana and flow northward into the Province of Alberta.

According to the report of the International Waterton-Belly Rivers Engineering Board appointed by the Commission to secure necessary data for the Commission, there are no existing consumptive uses in the United States of the waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers arising out of existing dams and other works or projects located in these waters; but the water requirements arising out of existing dams and other works or projects located in these waters in Canada as of the date of the Reference are 86,920 acre feet annually increasing to a total of 120,670 acre feet annually under full development of such existing dams and other works or projects, and the water requirements on the Waterton River to provide a minimum flow of 30 c.f.s. to satisfy riparian and other uses in Canada was estimated at 21,710 acre feet. The report indicated that the average annual flow of the Waterton and Belly Rivers crossing the International boundary from Montana into Alberta is 363,200 acre feet.

In the judgment of the Canadian Commissioners there is no plan which would be practicable in the public interest to enable the United States to use these waters in the future within the boundaries of the United States and no real possibility of the United States being able at any time in the future to divert and put to beneficial use any part of these waters within the boundaries of the United States. On the other hand, the Prairie Farm

Rehabilitation Administration of Canada, in view of its belief that these waters could not be put to beneficial use within the boundaries of the United States, had made plans prior to the date of the reference to utilize all the water surplus in the Waterton and Belly Rivers on projects in Canada. These plans are based upon sound engineering data and in the judgment of the Canadian Commissioners are practicable and in the public interest. Some of the component parts of the plan were initiated prior to the date of the reference and others are now in process of construction.

Having regard to these facts the Canadian Commissioners were not prepared to prevent the use of any part of these waters by Canada by recommending an apportionment to the United States of these waters which could not be diverted and put to beneficial use within the boundaries of the United States. The Commission being evenly divided upon the matter referred to it for report, this report is made by the Canadian Commissioners to the Government of Canada pursuant to Article IX of the Treaty.

The Canadian Commissioners wish to take this opportunity of recording their appreciation of the technical advice and assistance given to them by the International Waterton-Belly Rivers Engineering Board and the Engineering Committee and other officials of Canada and the United States, and express their regret that a joint report of the Commission was not possible.

Dated at Regina, Saskatchewan, this 17th day of September, A.D. 1955.[176]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 3, 1956

My dear Colleague,

As you know, there has in recent months been a great deal of attention directed to some important water and hydro electric power problems that are of joint concern to Canada and the United States. These involve the Columbia and Fraser Rivers, the Yukon River, the Saint John River, and also several smaller rivers that have not received the same amount of public attention. I have been considering what action the federal government ought to take, if any, at this time toward a solution of several of the problems and I should like in this letter to put my personal views forward for your consideration. I am sending a letter the same as this to our colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, so that I can get his comments as well.

This memorandum was discussed by Cabinet at its meeting on January 18, 1956.

I think that we have arrived at a critical point in arrangements for the use of water resources in rivers which are not boundary waters but which flow across the international boundary in one direction or the other. The situation in relation to the Columbia River is quite well known. There have been a number of proposals from the United States for measures to develop power from its waters through the provision of storage in Canada. The most notable recently have been the proposal for a dam at Libby, Montana, which would back water into Canada, and the Kaiser proposal to develop storage on the Arrow Lakes. In the Libby case, the Canadian Government took the position, on July 7th, 1954, that the International Joint Commission's approval of the Libby project should be subject to a condition that all results from the over-all study of the Columbia Basin should be taken into account.[177] That study is not yet complete and will not be for another two years or so. The government's decision was accordingly one that imposed a substantial delay on any action. We and the government of British Columbia both brought up the question of downstream benefits. The Kaiser proposal was a most undesirable one. It led to the passage of the International River Improvements Act and to a good deal of controversy with the British Columbia Government, and the development was prevented. In both of these cases we can be cast in the role, both domestically and internationally, of an obstacle to power development, without being able to disclose thus far in our defence any action on our part to bring about alternative developments or to solve the problems that stand in the way of such developments.

The federal government did take action more than a year ago to initiate a study of the economic feasibility of diverting water from the Columbia River to the Fraser River.[178] This study is not yet complete but it has already been made apparent that, however the economics turn out, there is going to be a major problem with regard to the Fraser River salmon fishery which may prevent any diversion for power purposes. It might well be that the plan will not lead to any positive results. Accordingly, the diversion study may, in the end, not appear as a positive contribution by the federal government.

In the case of the Yukon River there was about 1950 a proposal for a diversion from Canada that would permit the development of a very large block of power by the Aluminum Company of America on the Taiya Inlet near Skagway in Alaska.[179] The federal government at that time took the position (as in the Kaiser case) that Canadian resources should, if at all possible, be developed in Canada and not devoted to use in another country. Following this, Ventures Limited worked out their plan for a diversion of Yukon river water which would develop power on the Taku River in northern British Columbia. This project has been under active consideration for several years and seems to be economically feasible. However, in presenting a brief to the Gordon Commission[180] in Victoria, Ventures Limited said that the fear of international complications in their project had kept industrialists from committing themselves to participate and were holding it up.

In all of these cases where large power projects are involved, international complications, or the fear of them, play a major part in the preventing or delaying development. In all of these cases, too, the federal government can be made to appear as the agency which, so far as Canada is concerned, has prohibited the developments that have been proposed. It can also be said, with truth, that if the international complications are holding up developments it is the duty of the federal government to try to have them removed.

In the above cases the problems that arise are of two kinds — in some instances both are present, in others only one. One problem is the way in which benefits should be shared which flow from developments upstream on a river that crosses the international boundary lower down. This is the downstream benefit question and since it arose with such importance on the Columbia River it is showing itself up on a good many other river problems that come before the International Joint Commission. Both the United States and Canadian sections have felt the need to be extremely careful in dealing with all benefit cases so that any points yielded on, say, the small Souris River, would not arise as questions of principle to imperil a national interest on a larger river. The second problem has been that of the right of the upstream state to divert water and also the extent and character of the right of the downstream state to be heard or to receive compensation.

The problem of downstream benefits is entirely unsettled but it clearly has to be worked out in some fashion before a good many projects can proceed. As to the diversion question, it is covered by Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty — an article which was forced on Canada in its present terms. Under it each country has the unlimited right to deal with water that crosses the boundary while it is on its own side of the boundary. Principles of compensation are set forth but there is some doubt whether the form of compensation is effective and there is complete doubt as to just what constitutes a downstream appropriation for which a citizen or other interest there is entitled to compensation. Canada has a strong position in the complete right that is given to divert, since in most important cases we are the upstream state, but we have to recognize that there are a good many unsolved problems in the situation which can and are likely to lead to serious difficulties with the United States if we put our rights into effect too baldly.

There have been a number of suggestions from various sources that negotiations should be undertaken with the United States to solve these water problems. The Premier of British Columbia has suggested this twice in press interviews in the last few months. The Leader of the Liberal Party in British Columbia has recently placed a motion on the Order Paper in the Provincial House advocating discussions. Newspaper and other agencies have made similar proposals. The Member of Parliament for Vancouver - Quadra suggested in the House of Commons on January 23 (Hansard, p. 396) that "a treaty must be negotiated with the United States concerning payment for downstream benefits." He asked what the federal government had done about the problem.

At the same time that complications have arisen in this field developments are going forward to try to provide alternative energy sources at costs comparable with those of cheap hydro-electric power. It was recently announced that the Kaiser Company has entered into a long-term contract to secure thermal power on the Ohio river for the production of aluminum and for an aluminum rolling mill. The power will be produced from coal and the contract calls, apparently, for 450,000 k.w. at a price of about 4 mills. If thermal power can be produced at such a price on a large scale in the United States it will seriously diminish the relative advantage of large scale hydro electric power. Atomic power may not be in the same cost bracket for quite some time, but it is a prospect on the horizon. In these circumstances it is difficult to feel that time is on our side. The government would be particularly vulnerable to criticism if it had not acted to remove obstacles in the way of hydro electric power development and then found that the potential industrial users of such power had turned to other sources. All in all it appears to me that the federal government must initiate action to solve some of the problems I have referred to.

There have in recent months been some discussions of these matters in the International Joint Commission. On April 5th, 1955, the Chairman of the Canadian Section made a statement on the problem of downstream benefits and the Fraser diversion study and suggested a general discussion in the Commission "which might lead to the formulation of principles" for application in the Columbia valley.[181] General McNaughton outlined the Canadian position and made some specific suggestions as to subjects for discussion. At the next meeting of the Commission on October 4th, 1955, the Chairman of the United States Section made it clear that the proposed Fraser River diversion would result in great harm to the United States and indicated that there was no satisfactory basis for the joint discussion of the specific subjects that had been mentioned by General McNaughton. Both General McNaughton and Governor Jordan have, as a result of these exchanges, been forced to take positions publicly which will make it difficult for them to negotiate, particularly if such negotiations have to be in the public forum of the International Joint Commission.

The United States also suggested informally nearly a year ago that a reference should be made to the International Joint Commission to study all waters crossing the boundary between Canada and Alaska. We have managed to put the proposal off so far but there have been clear indications that the U.S. plans to return to the question. A reference could hold up any development of the Yukon for years unless great care were taken. I think it would be quite undesirable to get involved in a reference but it may be difficult to avoid unless discussions are entered into to set forth the developments we propose in Canada and to settle the difficult issues that are bound to arise at some stage. With the position Governor Jordan has taken on the Columbia I do not see much hope of working this matter out in the International Joint Commission.

Apart from the difficulties that are presented by the publicity that has attached to exchanges in the Commission it seems to me that the question of downstream benefits and the problems relating to diversions are fundamental questions of policy on which discussions to arrive at solutions of principle have to occur first on a direct government-to-government basis. The International Joint Commission has been able to deal effectively with problems relating to boundary waters because the principles were worked out in advance and incorporated with clarity in the Boundary Waters Treaty. The reason, I think, that it has been impossible to deal successfully in the Commission with recent questions of benefit-sharing in the case of rivers that cross the boundary is because the problem of downstream benefits has not been settled at all as between the governments and the position under Article II with regard to diversion leaves a great many unanswered questions. I think that only the two governments can negotiate as to acceptable arrangements from the respective national points of view on the problem of downstream benefits, and only the Government of Canada can consider how far, if at all, it should modify its position with regard to rights to divert and the character of compensation. Only the two governments also can settle the points unanswered in the Treaty, as to what constitutes a downstream appropriation which gives a right to compensation when a diversion takes place. All of these questions involve, basically, the problem of determining how far to go in establishing principles about the sharing or division of national resources in a case where the Treaty is silent (downstream benefits) or in a case where we have a clear right to use a resource and have to consider how far this country ought to go to meet the undoubtedly violent objections that could arise from the U.S. (the Article II problem). They are questions of high policy of the kind that should, I think, be settled directly between the governments.

In other words, both because of the tactical difficulties that have developed in the Commission, but more fundamentally because of the policy character of the questions involved, it seems to me that what is needed is to initiate discussions between Canada and the United States on a governmental basis. It also seems to me, for the reasons I have outlined above, that there are strong arguments in favour of the Government of Canada taking the initiative and doing so at an early date.

There are two considerations in relation to the position in the United States. One is that Senator Neuberger, a Democrat, has advocated with much publicity that discussions must be between the governments and not in the International Joint Commission. In doing so, he has strongly attacked Governor Jordan in a highly political way. Because of this it may be difficult for the U.S. government to agree to have special discussions without appearing to repudiate Governor Jordan. However, what is quite certain is that they cannot take the initiative in suggesting them. The initiative must come from us, and it must be so handled that it can be accepted by the U.S. government without appearing to be a reflection on Governor Jordan.

The second consideration is that there will be a presidential election in November and water questions can be expected to be politically sensitive. We cannot expect, in such circumstances, to make any significant progress before the election. However, the discussions are bound to be long drawn out in any case and I do not think we could expect to clear more than the preliminaries by November. The prospect of the election does not, to my mind, constitute a reason why we should not make an approach on the matter.

If discussions were to be initiated the most careful consideration would have to be given to the basis on which they should be launched. Clearly we must not abandon the position that we have a complete right to make any diversion we see fit under Article II. This is most important in itself and it can be an important bargaining factor in working out a satisfactory solution on the problem of downstream benefits. It also is a reason why the Columbia River should not be considered in isolation since the possibility of diversion there is, at best, doubtful. The Yukon River is a case where a diversion is clearly practical and for that reason, apart from its intrinsic importance, it seems to me that it should be in the forefront of any discussions. If the government were to decide in principle that discussions should be initiated I think I should instruct the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy to work out recommendations as to the basis for opening discussions and as to the tactics that should be followed.

I should very much appreciate it if I could have your comments on these proposals. You might wish to discuss the matter with Mr. Howe and me. If the consensus of the three of us is along the lines I have outlined, I think I should then discuss the question with General McNaughton so as to outline the reasons why it is felt that discussions should be undertaken between the governments in the first instance rather than in the International Joint Commission. I would certainly want to get his views and it would, I think, be most important to have his advice in the course of any discussions that developed. He and his staff have experience and background in these matters that could, I hope, be drawn on by the government. As a third step I would propose to submit a memorandum to the Cabinet asking for approval for negotiations to be undertaken.

Please let me have your views.

Yours sincerely,

JEAN LESAGE

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 6, 1956

My dear Colleague:

Thanks for your confidential letter of February 3rd.

Without having been able to discuss the matter with Mr. Pearson, I have no hesitation in saying that I am convinced that a solution of the problem of downstream benefits on international rivers will never be solved by the International Joint Commission. I have suggested on several occasions that a Cabinet Committee be formed to deal with this matter. My thought in this connection was that we propose to the United States that a special tribunal be established to deal with this one matter.

I also agree with you that the question is becoming urgent. I fear that our international relations may be affected seriously by further delay in dealing with this matter. However, I would assume that no progress can be made in appointing the tribunal until after the next United States election, although an approach to the United States Government could be made prior to the election. I am sure that even an approach by Canada would do much to quiet the bad feeling that is being developed in certain quarters.

Thanks for bringing this to my attention.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 13, 1956

RIVERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: PROPOSED NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE U.S.

I attach a copy of a letter of February 3 which you received from Mr. Lesage, proposing that negotiations be opened with the Government of the United States through normal diplomatic channels on problems relating to rivers which flow across the international boundary. The two chief issues are:

(a) diversions of such rivers, and

(b) downstream benefits, i.e., the sharing between upstream and downstream interests of the increased electricity production resulting from storage projects in the upstream area.

These issues arise on the Columbia and Fraser rivers, the Yukon River, the Saint John River, and also on several smaller rivers which flow across the boundary. We have been informed by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources that Mr. Howe has already replied to Mr. Lesage's letter expressing the view that these questions should not be dealt with in the International Joint Commission, but that a "special international tribunal" should be created to deal with the Columbia problems. I understand that there has been some discussion between you and Mr. Lesage on this proposal.

2. Officials in the Department have not had time to give Mr. Lesage's proposal the full consideration it deserves. The International Joint Commission has been dealing with the Columbia and Saint John Rivers. The studies of the International Joint Commission on the Columbia River will not be completed for at least two years, and the Canadian Government's own study on the feasibility of the diversion from the Columbia into the Fraser is to be ready by July 1. In view of these pending studies and the belief that our bargaining position on both questions is strong, it had generally been assumed by officials in External Affairs that no negotiations would be proposed at this time. What follows is, therefore, the result of brief consideration since we saw Mr. Lesage's letter.

3. The Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 does not provide a set of rules which the International Joint Commission merely needs to interpret, when it is faced with a dispute on waters flowing across the boundary as distinct from waters through which the boundary passes. On the question of diversion, Article II of the treaty provides that the upstream state may divert the water from one river to another in its territory as it wishes, the only risk being a suit for damages by interests adversely affected downstream. This suit would be brought in the courts of the upstream state. There would be considerable merit in the two governments ending this state of affairs by agreeing to an equitable set of rules to adjudicate between upstream and downstream rights. Similarly, there is no provision in the treaty on the question of downstream benefits. Before further plans for development of electricity can be made on the Columbia, the Yukon, and also on other rivers, appropriate formulae have to be worked out for downstream benefits. Although the work of the International Joint Commission could contribute to the solution of both of these matters, ultimately negotiations between the two governments would in all probability be necessary. The question posed by Mr. Lesage's letter, accordingly, is whether now is the right time to embark on these negotiations, and whether Canada should take the initiative.

4. Some of the arguments in favour of initiating negotiations now appear to be:

(a) We have always proceeded on the assumption that time is on Canada's side. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is now coming to doubt this; competitive sources of electrical energy, such as coal-operated thermal plants and atomic plants, may soon produce electricity cheaply enough to detract from the present financial advantage of hydro-electric power. Moreover, the decreasing proportion of hydro-electric power in the whole supply system over the next ten to twenty years may also make the need to make a bargain for water storage appear less pressing.

(b) We cannot be absolutely confident of the outcome of current Canadian engineering studies on the feasibility of diverting the Columbia into the Fraser. Our bargaining position would be weakened if these studies turned out to be less promising than was predicted. As these studies are due to be completed by July 1, it is quite likely that their results would become known to the Americans in the following two or three months. As we do not envisage the negotiations being concluded this year, the possibility of an adverse report on the feasibility of the Columbia diversion would have to be taken into account in any event, whether negotiations are started now or later.

(c) Senator Neuberger has publicly acknowledged that there is a case for Canadian claims to compensation for benefits conferred downstream by regulated storage upstream in Canada. This admission by one senator that Canada has a case is in contrast to the attitude adopted by a number of United States spokesmen in the past.

(d) As Senator Neuberger has publicly attacked Governor Jordan, the United States Chairman of the International Joint Commission, it would be very difficult for the United States to initiate diplomatic negotiations now, as this would imply a lack of confidence in Governor Jordan. Hence, if negotiations are to be initiated, Canada would probably have to move first.

5. The arguments against appear to be:

(a) Such an initiative on Canada's part may suggest to some people in the United States that the Canadian Government is unable (for engineering or financial reasons) to carry out the proposed diversion, or unwilling (for political reasons, possibly connected with fish) to carry out the proposed diversion. Our negotiating position might therefore appear weak, whereas on the Yukon diversion at least, our position is in fact good, and our short-term position on downstream benefits is also strong.

(b) Although hydro-electric power may be losing its relative price advantage, nevertheless the power potential of the Columbia and Yukon basins remains a great national asset, and arrangements made for these rivers will last for a very long time, probably for generations. Hence there is an argument for waiting until the existing studies have been completed and digested before entering upon negotiations. Moreover, both Governor Jordan and General McNaughton are in favour of further studies under International Joint Commission auspices, although they have failed so far to agree to the terms of these studies.

(c) There are no clear generally accepted ideas amongst Canadian officials at present as to the ends we should seek in negotiations either on the diversion issue or on the downstream benefits issue. There is no body of specialists which has been built up over the years comparable to the specialists on the St. Lawrence. We are thus not very well prepared to embark on negotiations at present.

(d) There is at least room for doubt about our ability to keep the Yukon River rather than the Columbia in the forefront of the negotiations, now that Frobisher-Ventures has announced its temporary abandonment for plans for development of the Yukon.

In addition, there may be other considerations of which officials are unaware which would have a bearing on the timing of negotiations.

6. As Mr. Lesage does not envisage that negotiations would pass beyond the preliminary stage before November of this year, there appears to be no great urgency for taking the decision. In this case you might think it desirable to suggest that Mr. Lesage's proposal be studied by the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy before it is taken up by the Cabinet.

7. There seem to be a number of difficulties about the proposal for a special international tribunal which has been put forward by Mr. Howe to Mr. Lesage.[182] There would need to be lengthy negotiations on the terms of reference of such a tribunal. Moreover, if the tribunal were to be of a quasi-judicial character and to hold public hearings, Canada could expect to find itself in the position of appearing before the tribunal to defend the rights conferred on it by Article II of the Boundary Waters Treaty. In so far as hearings and studies by a tribunal can contribute to the solution of these issues, then presumably the International Joint Commission, with its established position, procedures and expert advice, can fulfil this role. One of the reasons for Mr. Lesage's suggestion is that confidential diplomatic negotiations are more likely to achieve a result than proceedings in a public forum, and this argument would appear to apply against a tribunal as to the International Joint Commission. If it is proposed that the new tribunal should arbitrate as between conflicting national policies, then this raises the question of the desirability of Canada permitting its interests in such a serious question to be decided upon in this way.

8. Before drafting a reply to Mr. Lesage's letter for your consideration, I should be grateful for your guidance on these questions.

9. I am sending a copy of this memorandum and of Mr. Lesage's letter to the Embassy in Washington, with a request for their comments.

I am afraid that this will not satisfy Mr. Lesage nor, for that matter, any of your Cabinet Colleagues.[183] The problems as posed by Mr. Lesage is mostly political. Mr. Wershof and myself have a few political thoughts and we are at your disposal if you would care to call us in.[184]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 17, 1956

My dear Colleague,

I have considered the proposal put forward in your letter of February 3, that negotiations on a governmental and diplomatic level should be initiated with the United States on problems concerning rivers which flow across the international boundary. You have put forward strong arguments for the necessity of such negotiations and also for their early initiation by Canada. I am sure you will agree however that before embarking on negotiations, it is desirable that we should have received and digested the technical reports on questions like these. Moreover, it would also be desirable that we should have a clear idea of what we are trying to obtain, both on downstream benefits and on the diversion of rivers. Generally speaking, I am impressed by the need for careful consideration of this rather complex subject.

I would suggest that at this stage you might convene a meeting of the interested Ministers to discuss this proposal. In addition to Mr. Howe and myself, you would probably want to invite one of the Ministers from British Columbia, possibly Mr. Sinclair, in view of his particular interest in the Columbia and Fraser Rivers as Minister of Fisheries. We could then have a preliminary discussion of your proposal and we could, amongst other things, consider whether or not it would be advisable to have the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy study the proposal before Cabinet is asked to consider it.

RIVERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

We have referred to you a copy of Mr. Lesage's letter to the Minister of February 3, and of our memorandum to the Minister of February 13 on this subject. We are sending you today a copy of Mr. Lesage's memorandum to the Cabinet dated February 22.†

2. This question was discussed several days ago at a meeting between Messrs. Pearson, Howe, Sinclair and Lesage, and as a result it was decided to recommend to the Cabinet that discussions be initiated with the United States on this issue, and that the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy be instructed to make recommendations as to the basis for opening discussions, and as to the course which should be followed in carrying them out. This recommendation was approved by the Cabinet yesterday. We shall keep you informed of the discussions in the Advisory Committee.

3. In his memorandum to Cabinet Mr. Lesage envisages that the discussions would be long and drawn-out, and that we need not expect to clear more than the preliminaries before the election in November. However, the Government may well decide that the first approach to the United States should be made fairly soon, that is, within the next two or three weeks. I should be glad to have your views as to the timing of the initial approach, and generally on the basis for opening these negotiations.

RIVERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

We had prepared, before receipt Saturday morning of your telegram under reference, a rather long message containing our views and comments on Mr. Lesage's proposal. Although parts of this message have now been overtaken by events we have decided to send it (our immediately following telegram) as originally drafted in the hope that it will be of some help to you particularly on the two aspects of Mr. Lesage's proposal with which it dealt: (a) the question of Canadian-United States relations and (b) the likely reaction of the United States Government to our proposal.

2. You will see that our views and comments were in strong support of the decision which has now been taken by Cabinet.

3. However, you will also see that it is not at all easy — on the basis of the slight evidence available — to forecast what the reaction of the United States Government will be to a proposal by Canada that negotiations be conducted through the diplomatic channel rather than in the IJC. It is far from certain that the reaction will be favourable. Nor is it easy, therefore to offer anything like firm views on the question of the timing of our initial approach to the Americans.

4. As I indicate in my immediately following telegram, it would appear to us that the chances of the United States Government accepting our proposal would be better later on than they are now. A proposal by US in the next two or three weeks to "negotiate" solutions intergovernmentally could possibly be rejected. However, it is difficult to conceive a rejection of a proposal for "discussions." In any case and on balance, I would think that our approach might be made as soon as we are ready to make it and as soon as we are ready to engage in the discussions envisaged.

5. The Prime Minister's and your meetings here in a month's time could I think be used to support our proposal. To take full advantage of them, it might be advisable if our formal proposal for "discussions" were put in just prior to these meetings.

6. I assume that although you speak of initiating "discussions", what you have in mind is that a solution to at least some of the issues relating to rivers flowing across the boundary should be sought through government-to-government "negotiations." We should expect therefore that this will have to be made clear to the United States Government when we make our proposal (unless the possibility is envisaged that the initial "discussions" will relate only to the advisability of opening intergovernmental "negotiations"). We should also expect that the United States will ask us what specific issues we want to have negotiated. In this connection, it would be advisable, I think, to tell the United States what, if any, responsibilities (beyond, perhaps, factual studies and surveys) we envisage the IJC would retain in the general question of rivers flowing across the boundary; presentationally it might be easier for the United States, if they were able to show that the IJC (ie Governor Jordan) was not being totally divested of all its responsibilities.

7. As I have indicated in my immediately following telegram, the only evidence available to us to gauge the likely reaction of the United States Government to our proposal would seem on balance to indicate that it may not be favourable. It will be important therefore, in making our proposal and in the support which the Prime Minister and yourself might deem appropriate to give to it next month, to muster all the arguments, national and international in scope, — some of which I have outlined in my longer message.

RIVERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY — PROPOSED NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Lesage's letter seems to me an important step towards the ultimate solution of the difficult problems that have arisen or will arise between Canada and the United States concerning the use of waters that flow across the international boundary.

2. The letter focusses attention on the two main problems: the question of downstream benefits; and the conflict between the claim of the upstream state to the use of whatever water it may choose to divert in its own territory and the claim of the downstream state to the use of water in its territory that has been "dedicated" by virtue of prior appropriation. The letter also outlines the many other questions that will require careful examination before an eventual solution is reached, such as the absence from the 1909 Treaty of any clear-cut principles that would assist in the solution of these important problems; the value of upstream storage sites; the feasibility of plans for upstream diversions; the relative value of hydroelectric power as compared to electric power generated by thermal or atomic means, or compared to other forms of energy, primarily natural gas and oil; and the important question of the role of the International Joint Commission and the implications for that body of the proposal to initiate diplomatic negotiations.

3. However, I shall in this telegram limit my comments to the following two aspects of the complex of problems facing the Canadian and United States governments:

(a) the question of Canadian-United States relations; and

(b) the possible reaction of the United States Government to a Canadian proposal for diplomatic negotiations.

4. With reference to my first point, it seems to me that it is absolutely essential in any consideration of the problems arising out of the use of these international rivers, to keep in mind that the decisions that are finally taken will be of far-reaching significance politically, as well as economically, for both countries. What is involved essentially is to determine what distribution, if any, is to be made between the two countries of the vast supplies of hydroelectric energy that are potentially available on these international rivers. Since hydroelectric power at present is one of the most important bases for economic development, the decision on distribution and the amount of time spent in arriving at it will determine the speed, and for some years at least, the direction of the development of important and fast-growing regions in both countries.

5. The issues involved, then, are of fundamental importance and the stakes are certainly high enough to create pressures on the two governments to take whatever actions are legally possible under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 to reserve for their own use as large a share as possible of the hydroelectric potential of these rivers. If this were done by either country serious and permanent harm would certainly be done to the interests of the other, and would undoubtedly open a wide and serious breach in Canadian-United States relations. I assume, however, that the need for some form of negotiation is accepted by both governments.

6. We should, then, consider how relations between Canada and the United States are likely to be affected by the choice of the channel in which to conduct the very hard bargaining that is bound to take place before a mutually satisfactory settlement is arrived at. My point here is not whether a settlement is likely to be reached if the negotiations are conducted within the International Joint Commission, but how to minimize the strain on our relations with the United States while these negotiations are in progress. It may be that in time the IJC could come up with a mutually satisfactory settlement but I should think that, taking into account the public statements that have been made by the chairmen of the two national sections, and assuming that the IJC must conduct its business more or less publicly, Canadian-United States relations would be subjected to very severe and damaging strains. Already, even before the real negotiations have begun, we have seen how public statements can fan the flames of national prejudice and lead to serious misconceptions concerning the policy of both countries. We have seen also how these statements permit what are primarily international issues to be discussed publicly in the context of purely domestic problems so that the essential issues become obscured and are made more difficult of eventual solution. As an example I need refer only to the talk which is heard about abrogation of the 1909 Treaty and a reference to the International Court of Justice.

7. The conclusion that I am inclined to draw at this point is that the IJC although competent, is not the best channel for negotiating these basic issues of principle and policy on which the two governments have not yet agreed. It seems to me, therefore, that in the context of Canadian-United States relations, the balance is all in favour of the direct diplomatic channel. Furthermore if our bargaining position is likely to deteriorate with time, it is in our own interest to chose the faster channel.

8. Turning to my second point, ie, the possible reaction of the United States Government towards a proposal for diplomatic negotiations, the signs are not quite so easy to read. Although this proposal has not, of course, been discussed with United States officials, the possible reaction of their government can be gauged, I think, on the basis of views which American officials have volunteered in the context of Senator Neuberger's suggestion for inter-governmental negotiations. It would appear from these views that the administration would not act on the (Democratic) Senator's suggestion. The Senator's suggestion is, of course, something quite different from a proposal by the Canadian Government.

9. The attitude at the official level in the United States Government seems to be that the negotiations should be left with the IJC until events have shown that a settlement is unlikely to be reached through that channel. They seem to expect that the national sections will fail to agree and will so report separately to their governments. On the question of downstream benefits, United States officials seem to expect no substantive discussions, at least until the results of the Canadian study of the proposed Kootenay-Columbia-Fraser diversions are known. It seems, therefore, that the United States Government is not disposed to speed up the negotiations and it would appear logical to assume from this that they too have realized (if indeed they had not done so before) that time is no longer on Canada's side. Another factor that appears to point to an unfavourable United States reaction is the personal position of Governor Jordan. As you know, he is as close to being the administration's co-ordinator and spokesman on water power policies as any person can be under the United States form of government: he is reported to be very close to the White House where his views carry considerable weight. Unless our proposal for diplomatic negotiations appeared to the United States to offer substantial advantages, it would seem unlikely, therefore, that they would do anything that would be interpreted as lack of confidence in Governor Jordan and an appeasement of his critics. Nor, of course, would the administration wish to give the appearance of going along with Senator Neuberger.

10. There are other points as well which I think ought to be mentioned, even though they are at the moment difficult to assess. It seems likely that if the United States Administration were faced with a proposal for diplomatic negotiations, they would wish to take into account the possible reactions of Congress towards the implementation of the results of these negotiations through an executive agreement. Such an agreement might be construed by the supporters of Senator Bricker as an infringement of either the rights of Congress (which passed the 1909 Treaty) or the rights of United States citizens. In the negotiations on the Gut Dam and the discussions on Lake Ontario water levels, neither of which involved issues as significant as those now under consideration, we have had some indication of the importance that the Administration attaches to the reaction of Congress and the rights of United States citizens.

11. I do not rule out the possibility that the Administration might accept our proposal. It can be assumed that the objective of the United States Government is an amicable settlement of these questions with Canada, and that the position of Governor Jordan and the role of the IJC might well take a secondary place. This would be especially true, I think, if in making our proposal we were to indicate that we were not optimistic about the chances of the IJC reaching a settlement. It is possible, too, I think, that the coming election campaign might create a situation which would favour acceptance of our proposal by the Administration. It seems fairly certain already that the development of water power resources will be an important issue in this campaign, particularly in the Pacific Northwest States. Senator Neuberger has criticized the Administration's conduct of the negotiations with Canada on the Columbia River and it is possible, I think, that the United States Government may find itself at some stage of the campaign under attack for what will be alleged to be its failure to make progress on these important international issues. If that situation were to develop, it is conceivable that the Administration might welcome our approach as an opportunity to show that they are in fact moving towards a settlement of these questions.

12. It is possible, too, that the United States Government might welcome our proposal for an entirely different reason, namely as an opportunity to discuss parts of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, particularly Article II of the treaty and to clarify those parts of the treaty that deal with the right of downstream interests to claim compensation for damages. There might be some inclination also on their part to clarify whether or not the contracting parties to the treaties are bound to the same legal redress as that which is open to citizens or inhabitants of either country.

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY

EXCERPTS FROM MEMORANDUM OF GENERAL MCNAUGHTON COMMENTING ON DRAFT MEMORANDUM TO CABINET OF MARCH 2, 1956†

Note: The following excerpts contain the principal points made by General McNaughton concerning the proposed discussions with the United States.

"I do not believe that it is a safe position for Canada to open negotiation or even discussions on this matter of vital import to the future of our country until at the least:

We are satisfied that we know the real meaning of Article II of the Treaty of 1909 and that this real meaning differs in some substantial manner from the studies and appreciations furnished to the Government and Parliament of Canada by the Canadian Section IJC.

Why should we risk throwing away the immense benefits which the Treaty has been found to confer on Canada, now that it is a fact that, in the matter of rivers flowing across the boundary, Canada is the upstream state in all watersheds of first importance along the boundary?

Article II is in fact a most explicit definition of principles in regard to jurisdiction over waters which rise in one country and cross the boundary to the other. It provides that the law of the upstream state shall prevail, and that if its application should be felt by interests in the downstream state to result in injury to them, then their claims can be taken into the courts of the upstream state for whatever remedy may be available under the law prevailing in that upstream state.

Article II represents a compromise between the position that the U.S. asserted in 1909 — complete sovereignty by the upstream state over waters within its territory — and the position asserted for Canada — that such jurisdiction could not be exercised without regard to the effects on interests downstream in the other country.

The argument was long and determined, but finally two agreed principles were incorporated in Article II of the Treaty. The first gave exclusive jurisdiction to the upstream state and the second opened the courts of that state to downstream claimants, on full equality with the citizens of the upstream state.

Thus the Treaty does in fact establish the principle on which jurisdiction in waters crossing the boundary is established.

In accord with this principle, matters in dispute are to be settled by the courts of the upstream state and an opportunity is thus provided for the development both of law and of practice. Thus as particular problems become definite and are presented a mechanism is available for their solution.

As matters stand, it is Canadian law which the treaty establishes in the most important regions along the boundary, and it is most important that we should not casually open the way for proposals for "clarification" which may in fact be destructive of the advantageous position in which we now are.

Downstream benefits is a case in point. The application of Article II enables us to refrain from developments in our own country until we are satisfied that a fair recompense for Canadian resources used to the benefit of the U.S. has been offered.

The matter is one of bargain, based on the specific circumstances of each particular case; and as I have reported to the External Affairs Committee of the House, a fair bargain is one in which both sides benefit.

In the light of the decision reported that conversations on rivers flowing across the boundary is in fact desirable, it seems that this matter could be opened with less danger to Canada in the White Sulphur Springs conversations than otherwise.

The Prime Minister might mention the fact that the questions of the diversion of rivers flowing across the boundary and the division of benefits downstream have now become matters of public concern in both countries, and he might inquire whether the President has any views as to how discussions might best be organized with a view to reaching an equitable solution, in accord with the rights of the respective countries established by Article II of the Treaty of 1909.

By such an approach the way would be opened for the President to make any suggestion which he may have on his mind, and it would not be necessary for Canada to indicate any dissatisfaction with the Treaty as it is. Any suggestion that Canada does not consider that Article II has established the requisite "principles" would certainly be interpreted in the United States as dissatisfaction with the present Treaty.

If the President should allege "deficiencies" and "gaps", this approach would leave it open to Canada to defend the position if the suggestions should indicate an approach by the United States to the detriment of the rights and interests of Canada.

Whatever the President may put forward in reply will need the most careful study and evaluation before the matter is allowed to progress into the form of diplomatic or other organized discussion. Most certainly we should on no account admit any "deficiency or gap" in the principle established by Article II of the Treaty. The Prime Minister might, however, very appropriately express a willingness to apply this principle in the evolution of a "fair bargain" in specific cases such as the Columbia.

If the procedure indicated has been decided upon, it is suggested that the phrase in subparagraph 7)a), describing the subject for discussion, should read, "reach agreement on the application of the principles established in Article II and other clauses of the Treaty of 1909 to cases now requiring decision along the boundary."

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 60-56 Ottawa, March 6, 1956

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

On February 23, the Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that it be decided in principle that discussions should be initiated with the United States on a government-to-government basis for the purpose of working out principles to be applied to downstream benefits, diversions of water and other water power problems arising in the case of rivers crossing the international boundary. In accordance with the further decision of the Cabinet the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy has started its study on the basis for opening discussions and the course that should be followed in carrying them out. The recommendations of this memorandum take into account the preliminary discussion in the Advisory Committee.

2. It is considered desirable that these discussions be started fairly soon, and that the decision to start them should be made public. The pending election in the United States is another factor, and it is desirable that discussions should be at least initiated before the election campaign is in full swing.

3. There is strong support in the United States, particularly in the North West Pacific states, for projects for the greater utilization of the power potential of the Columbia River Basin. Hence we may presume that the United States Government would in general be favourable to a proposal for the type of discussions envisaged. It is possible, however, that the United States Government, while agreeing that discussions on these principles would be necessary sooner or later, may take the view that they should not start now. Senator Neuberger (Democrat) has proposed in recent weeks that the United States should seek to reach a speedy agreement with Canada on the problems of the Columbia River, by intergovernmental negotiations. He coupled this proposal with a vigorous attack on Mr. Jordan, the United States Chairman of the International Joint Commission. He declared that Mr. Jordan, by reason of his attitude on water questions generally, was not suited to represent the United States in negotiations on the Columbia. Mr. Jordan is a Republican appointee who apparently has considerable status in the Administration and, in his approach to water questions, reflects the Administration's attitude, whereas Senator Neuberger is a strong opponent of the Administration. The Administration may be unwilling to agree to the initiation of discussions so soon after Senator Neuberger's remarks, as this could be interpreted as showing lack of confidence in Mr. Jordan.

4. In the light of these considerations and in view of the invitation of President Eisenhower to the Prime Minister to visit him at White Sulphur Springs on March 26, it seems advisable that our proposal for the initiation of discussions should be put to the State Department in the next few days. In this initial approach, the subject should be described in very general terms. Attached is a draft memorandum, which it is recommended should be handed to the State Department.

5. In issuing his invitation to White Sulphur Springs to the Prime Minister, President Eisenhower has emphasized his desire to talk over questions of common interest with neighbouring countries. Our proposal to start discussions on rivers flowing across the border would, accordingly, be an appropriate question to mention at White Sulphur Springs. Although Mexican representatives will be present, it is hoped that there will be an opportunity to talk about questions like this in bilateral conversations. Accordingly, if the Prime Minister could refer to this proposal in his conversations with the President, this might help to overcome reluctance by the Administration to taking a step which could be interpreted as showing lack of confidence in Mr. Jordan.

6. When negotiations have been undertaken with the United States on questions like this in the past, it has been the practice to consult the provincial governments concerned. This procedure has been followed on the negotiations on the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Projects. The governments of the provinces concerned in the problem of waters flowing across the international boundary (British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec and New Brunswick) might be informed of the proposal by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The provincial governments could be informed either when the first approach is made to the State Department, or when the United States agrees to hold discussions, whichever the Cabinet deems appropriate.

7. I therefore recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, that:

(1) The United States Government should be asked to agree to hold inter-governmental discussions on questions concerning waters which flow across the international boundary, with a view that the governments may reach agreement on these questions; and that this be done by the delivery of a memorandum along the lines of the attached one to the State Department within the next few days;

(2) The Embassy in Washington should inform the State Department that the Prime Minister would like to refer to this question in the conversations at White Sulphur Springs;

(3) The governments of the provinces concerned with problems of waters flowing across the international boundary should be informed at an appropriate time of the Canadian approach to the United States Government.[185]

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY
DRAFT OF MEMORANDUM FOR HANDING TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT

In recent months there have been discussions in the International Joint Commission concerning waters which flow across the boundary between Canada and the United States. Whereas the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 sets forth the principles governing the use of boundary waters, it has been evident, in the course of these discussions, that the treaty does not provide comprehensive principles for the use by Canada and the United States of waters which flow across the boundary. Article II of the treaty establishes that each country has exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion of these waters. On the other hand, the treaty contains no principles to govern the sharing of benefits derived from developments on a river which crosses the boundary.

It seems desirable, therefore, that the two governments should attempt to work out more comprehensive principles for the use of waters flowing across the boundary. As the working out of these principles would be a long and complicated task, it is the view of the Canadian Government that discussions between the two governments should start in the near future with a view that the governments may reach agreement on these questions.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 7, 1956

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES (CABINET, MARCH 8).

You have already approved the memorandum to Cabinet on this subject, and the attached draft memorandum for handing to the State Department, and have seen the summary of the views of General McNaughton on an earlier draft. You might, however, care to have a memorandum outlining the interdepartmental discussions in the last few days.

2. At its meeting on February 23, the Cabinet decided to initiate discussions with the United States on this subject and instructed the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy to study the basis for opening discussions. At the meeting of the Advisory Committee it was decided to recommend that this question should be raised with President Eisenhower at the meeting at White Sulphur Springs. One advantage of this proposal would be to present the subject to President Eisenhower in the most suitable way, on the supposition that he might well have to deal with it in any event, because of the possible opposition of Mr. Jordan, the United States Chairman of the International Joint Commission. Moreover, raising the question with President Eisenhower would make more likely an early decision by the United States on our proposal.

3. The feeling of the Advisory Committee was that the President might be asked to approve the initiation of discussions during the Prime Minister's visit, with the idea that this decision might be announced in a communiqué at the end of the Prime Minister's visit. If this procedure were followed, it would make clear to Canadian public opinion that the government was taking action on this question and, a decision by the President and the Prime Minister to start the discussions might help to conceal that it was Canada that sought them.

4. In accordance with your instructions, the memoranda have now been altered, and they provide that the proposal to start the discussions be put to the State Department in the usual way within the next few days, and that the Prime Minister should refer to the question in the conversations at White Sulphur Springs. Under this revised draft, it is presumed that the Prime Minister would not ask the President to take a decision on the matter at White Sulphur Springs, although we would welcome a Presidential decision and also an announcement if the President were disposed to take this step. This altered procedure has the advantage that we do not run the risk of being told by the State Department that the President would not be ready to take a decision, or of the Prime Minister being told by the President that he was not in a position to take a decision. This procedure would overcome any possibility of awkwardness in announcing a Canadian-United States decision following upon tripartite talks. Moreover — and this is of particular interest to this Department — the revised approach would not risk giving the false impression that Canada is anxious to press on with serious and detailed discussions immediately. In fact, as you know, we are not prepared, either in terms of clearly thought-out ideas or in terms of people, to send a team to Washington this spring to start detailed and prolonged negotiations.

5. You will notice that the proposed subject for discussions is defined as "questions concerning waters which flow across the international boundary, with a view that the Governments may reach agreement on these questions". This definition of the subject is considerably broader than that in the recommendation to Cabinet of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, which read as follows: "for the purpose of working out principles to be applied to downstream benefits, diversions of waters and other water power problems arising in the case of rivers crossing the international boundary". The more general definition, without the reference to "water power problems", is more in accordance with the text of the Boundary Waters Treaty. Perhaps this should be pointed out to Cabinet.

6. The texts of the draft memorandum to Cabinet and the draft memorandum to be handed to the State Department were sent to General McNaughton for his comments. He gave his comments in a memorandum of March 5, which expressed quite strong criticisms of various points of the memorandum to Cabinet. General McNaughton's memorandum was considered at a meeting on March 6 of representatives of the Department of Northern Affairs, Privy Council and this Department. Some of his criticisms were embodied in revisions in the drafts. It was felt, however, that other points which he made should not be incorporated in the drafts. Accordingly, you have been given excerpts from General McNaughton's memorandum which cover the principal points made which, in the view of the representatives of the three Departments, should not be incorporated in the drafts.

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE BOUNDARY: DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

You have been sent by bag a copy of the memorandum to Cabinet of March 6 on this subject. In accordance with the decision of the Cabinet on March 8, I should be obliged if you would hand to the State Department a copy of the memorandum annexed to the memorandum to Cabinet. In my view you might best make this approach on March 14, as this will provide sufficient time for the State Department to inform the President of the Prime Minister's intention to raise this question at White Sulphur Springs. Alternatively Thursday would do.

2. From the memorandum to Cabinet and from previous papers which have been sent you, you will understand why the government is taking this step. The following are the principal points which you might bring out when handing the memorandum to the State Department.

3. One of the chief reasons for this initiative is the government's desire to do what is feasible to remove obstacles to the full development of the water resources of the Columbia and Yukon and other rivers. Principles should be agreed upon for the sharing between upstream and downstream interests of the benefits derived from the development of these rivers, and these principles will have to be applied to the particular projects on each river. The working out of these principles involves important questions of government policy, and it is a task which should be undertaken confidentially. For these reasons we propose diplomatic discussions.

4. In making this proposal, it is not our intention to minimize in any way the important role which the International Joint Commission has performed in the past and will perform in the future, in dealing with waters crossing the boundary, as with boundary waters.

5. The subject proposed for discussion in the memorandum is very broad, namely, the working out of more comprehensive principles for the use of waters flowing across the boundary. The memorandum refers particularly to the principles to govern the sharing of benefits derived from developments on a river which crosses the boundary, i.e., the problem of downstream benefits. As is indicated above, it is in order to resolve this and other problems that the government is proposing discussions. It is recognized, however, that other questions, such as diversions, are linked up with downstream benefits, and accordingly the subject for discussion is defined in broad terms. As you have indicated in your telegram 382 of March 3,† the discussions would not be confined to the water power aspects.

6. The memorandum suggests that the working out of principles for the use of waters flowing across the boundary would be a long and complicated task. We envisage that the discussions will last well past the end of this year, and that probably the United States representatives would be unwilling to reach a decision on questions of substance before the elections. We would like the discussions to start at a slow pace, and we are not prepared, for example, to send a team to Washington in several weeks to embark on detailed discussions. We are anxious, however, that the decision to start the discussions should be made fairly soon and that it be made public in order that it be clear what procedure is to be used in dealing with this subject.

7. In handing over the memorandum, you should say that the Prime Minister would like to refer to this proposal in discussions with the President at White Sulphur Springs, if a private discussion between the Prime Minister and the President is arranged. If the President is prepared to agree at White Sulphur Springs to the starting of the discussions we should, of course, be very glad. We are not, however, asking that the President should be prepared to take such a decision, but simply giving notice that this is one of the questions which the Prime Minister would like to raise with him.

8. We have considered whether the hearings of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which are to start on March 22, should cause us to defer making this approach to the State Department. The announcement of these hearings is somewhat embarrassing for us, because the State Department would receive our memorandum before the hearings start, and will be able to decide whether or not to accept our proposal in the light of the hearings. However, if we were to refrain from making the approach until after the end of the hearings, this would involve a delay of several weeks, and it would be difficult for the Prime Minister to raise the question with the President at White Sulphur Springs. For these reasons we have decided to proceed with this initiative despite the forthcoming hearing. You might make clear to the State Department that the decision to make our proposal was taken some weeks before the announcement of the hearings by the Senate Committee.[186]

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY

My immediately following telegram contains the text of a memorandum handed to us late yesterday afternoon by Outerbridge Horsey, who is still performing some of the functions of Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs. Horsey was accompanied by Marselis C. Parsons, who will probably replace him as Director of BNA and by George Vest, Canadian Desk Officer.

2. During Horsey's oral comments he said that the State Department memorandum was not "fully responsive" to the memorandum which we delivered to Livingston Merchant on March 15. He pointed out specifically that in the State Department's memorandum they had "backed away" from the last few words in the final paragraph of our memorandum concerning agreement between the governments. This had been done quite deliberately, Horsey said, but he emphasized that their purpose was not, repeat not, to exclude the possibility of intergovernmental agreement. They did wish, however, particularly at this early stage when there was no firm US view on many points that would arise during the discussions, to avoid the use of any language that might be interpreted as a commitment on the question of whether or not a new intergovernmental agreement would be required, or on the form that any agreement might take. At some later stage, Horsey thought, the representatives of the two governments would have to consult on these two points and to reach some decision, but until that time, it seemed wise to avoid any premature commitments.

[186] Le mémoire canadien a été transmis au Département d'État le 15 mars 1956. Pour connaître le compte rendu des discussions qui ont eu lieu ultérieurement sur cette question à White Sulphur Springs, voir le document 5.
The Canadian memorandum was delivered to the Department of State on March 15, 1956. For a report on the subsequent discussion of this question at White Sulphur Springs, see Document 5.

3. Concerning the reference in the State Department's memorandum to "necessary studies", Horsey confirmed that this meant national studies conducted separately.

4. With respect to the timing of the proposed discussions, Horsey said that he could not see how the US could be ready for an initial session before two or three months had gone by. He envisaged that after the necessary preparations had been made, there might be an initial session, lasting perhaps two days, the objective of which, on the US side at least, would be to obtain a better understanding of the problems or subjects that the Canadian Government wished to discuss. After the initial session, there probably would be an interval during which the governments would consider their own positions in the light of the information that had been exchanged. Vest suggested that there probably would be some preliminary exchanges of information through the diplomatic channel before the initial session was arranged and we did not disagree with him. There were some inconclusive comments about what the discussions might achieve, but the only point of any significance was that Horsey made particular reference to the possibility of clarifying what he called the legal remedies aspects of Article 2 of the 1909 treaty.

5. On the question of publicity, Horsey, referring to a comment we made when we delivered our memorandum, said that the US Government was agreeable to a public announcement of the decision to initiate diplomatic discussions and that they would probably wish to make one themselves. They would need a little time, however, since they would wish to consider carefully the language to be used in any US announcement. He said that the terms of the announcement would have to be cleared with each of the different US agencies concerned with this question. In reply to our question Horsey said that they had not yet given any thought to whether the governments might issue joint or separate announcements. His own opinion, he said, was that it might be simpler if the two governments were to issue separate press releases. If there were separate announcements it would be desirable to coordinate the timing of the release.

6. There was some discussion on whether or not it would be desirable in drafting the announcements, to try to anticipate questions which are almost certain to be asked in both countries. Horsey said that the US, for instance, would probably wish to spell out quite clearly the relationship between, on the one hand, the proposed discussions, and on the other, the Columbia River reference and the work of the International Joint Commission generally. We ventured the personal opinion that Canada might wish to do the same. Vest asked if we knew whether or not the Canadian announcement would include any reference to the committee that might be used to advise the Canadian Government during the course of the proposed discussions. We said that although we did not really know, it seemed unlikely that our announcement would include anything like that. However, we said that we would raise this point with you and let the State Department know your comments.

7. What we have said so far covers the more or less formal conversations that we had with Horsey when he delivered the memorandum. Afterwards, when we spoke to Vest, he gave us informally the following additional information. With respect to the words "the use of waters from rivers crossing the international boundary", Vest told us that this choice of words was quite deliberate and that it indicated the wish of the US Government to have the discussions cover as broad an area as possible. He said that there appeared to be some feeling in the US Government that a discussion aimed at the definition of "principles" might be a little more restrictive than they might desire, and there was some feeling also that a direct reference to principles might create in the minds of the US public a preconceived idea of the kind of result that the discussions between the two governments were meant to achieve. In the US Government's view, Vest said it is not yet clear just what result the discussions might have, since they will, in part at least, be an exploration of what is at the moment virgin territory.

8. Vest told us also that our proposal for discussions had been discussed recently at a meeting in the White House at which there had been recommended the establishment of a committee to be known as the Advisory Committee on Canadian Boundary Waters Problems which would be responsible for advising the US Government during the course of the discussions with Canada. Apparently this suggestion has yet to be considered by Mr. Sherman Adams, but the State Department are quite hopeful that he will give his approval. If it is approved, the Committee will consist of representatives at the Deputy Assistant Secretary level from the following US agencies: Department of the Army, Department of the Interior, Department of Justice, Federal Power Commission, and the Department of State. In addition, the Committee will probably include Governor Jordan, who is quite likely to act as Chairman, and Major General John S. Bragdon, who is an adviser in the White House on water resources. Vest was not familiar with Bragdon's work, but he thought that Bragdon had helped to write the recent report of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Water Resources Policy (PACWRAP).

9. Vest said that the proposed new committee would, in fact, act as a subcommittee of the existing Interdepartmental Committee on Water Resources (ICWATR). Governor Jordan apparently acts in an advisory capacity to both PACWRAP and ICWATR, and for this reason, in the interests of coordination, it seemed likely that he would be named chairman of the new committee. It is considered that the new committee will be capable of handling all of the legal or technical questions which will come up during the discussions with Canada, but policy considerations will probably be referred to PACWRAP.

10. Vest asked that this information be confined to official government circles in Ottawa, and we naturally undertook to observe his request.

WATERS FLOWING ACROSS THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY

Following is the text of the memorandum handed to us late yesterday afternoon by Outerbridge Horsey. Text begins:

In response to the Canadian Embassy's memorandum of March 15/56, the Government of the United States has given careful consideration to the proposal of the Canadian Government that there be discussions between the two governments concerning the use of waters from rivers crossing the international boundary and would welcome such discussions, in the confidence that they will contribute to the development of these important resources in a spirit of friendly cooperation. It is suggested that after the necessary studies have been completed, arrangements be made for a meeting of representatives of the two governments in either Ottawa or Washington. Ends.

MEETING OF MR. JEAN LESAGE AND PREMIER BENNETT, JULY 4, 1956

As you know, Mr. Lesage met Premier Bennett of British Columbia at Victoria on July 4 for the purpose in part of discussing the matter of the prospective talks with the United States Government regarding waters which cross the International Boundary.

2. The attached report of the conversations between Mr. Lesage and Mr. Bennett was prepared by Mr. E.A. Côté of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. This report, which was submitted to the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy on Friday, July 13, is forwarded to you for information. While it was not thought necessary to summarize this report, I should like to draw your attention specifically to the paragraph at the bottom of page 2, headed "Inclusion of British Columbia representative in team 'negotiations' with United States".[187]

MEETING OF MR. JEAN LESAGE AND PREMIER BENNETT — 2.30 P.M. ON JULY 4, 1956 AT VICTORIA

In addition to Mr. Lesage and Premier Bennett, the meeting was attended by Mr. R.W. Bonner, Attorney General, and Mr. Ray Williston, Minister of Lands & Forests. Officials present were Messrs. E. Bassett, B.C. Deputy Minister of Lands & Forests, A.F. Paget, Comptroller of Water Rights for B.C., George Kidd, B.C., Lands & Forests Department, R.G. Robertson and E.A. Côté of the federal department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

[187] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
We shall have to watch this L.B. P[earson]

Purpose of Talks with Premier Bennett

The meeting opened in a very cordial manner and two items of unrelated business were settled in a satisfactory manner. Mr. Lesage introduced the third item, namely the prospective talks with the United States Government regarding waters which cross the international boundary. He explained briefly that while six other provinces and the Yukon Territory have a direct interest in these matters, British Columbia had by far the greatest hydro-electric potential from rivers which cross the boundary. Mr. Lesage said that the talks with the United States early this autumn would be most preliminary ones. It was a matter for each country to start "feeling out" the other. Mr. Lesage indicated that his purpose in coming to Victoria was to ascertain the viewpoint of the British Columbia Government. "After all", said Mr. Lesage, "indeed before all, this is a question of developing the resources of British Columbia and the initiative in this rests with the government of British Columbia."

Request to Stop Power Exports from B.C.

Premier Bennett opened his comments by saying that he "formally asked the National Government to prevent the permanent or temporary export of power developed in British Columbia to the United States." When questioned, the Premier said he had in mind, among other things, the export of power from Waneta. Mr. Bennett said that there was a great demand for power in the Vancouver area which could use the Waneta power. He again repeated that no hydroelectric power produced in B.C. should be exported to the United States.

British Columbia's Ideas on Export of Water

So much for hydroelectric power. When it came to water, Mr. Bennett said that Columbia River water flowed to the United States anyway. He wanted for B.C. the utmost downstream benefits in the form of power. Mr. Bennett also wanted power in the Kootenays at the lowest possible cost. He admitted that he wanted to attract industry to the Kootenay area by low power costs; to do this, he was prepared to subsidize industry in the Kootenays from downstream benefits. Mr. Bennett's thesis was that Columbia waters belonged to the area which should first benefit from these waters. He said that he could get the "dams" built at no cost to British Columbia by Canadian companies which would give in addition a percentage of downstreams benefits. Mr. Bennett indicated that the cost of building all the dams could be paid out of downstream benefits and he enquired jokingly whether the federal government would not "build them for the downstream benefits". At all events, Mr. Bennett stipulated that he did "not want the federal government to negotiate on downstream benefits for less than the value of the dams plus 20%". He indicated that no commitments or water rights had, as yet, been given to any company. Mr. Paget replied to a question by Mr. Lesage that he was convinced that 40% of the downstream would finance the Mica Dam. Mr. Bennett continued by saying that B.C. will want the balance of downstream benefits to pay for the dam and later "to come back if possible". He added that "we will need all the remaining 40% in 1970-1975". Mr. Bonner, however, was skeptical about the political possibility of putting into effect a recapture clause.

Downstream Benefits Versus at-site Power

Mr. Lesage, seeking further information, indicated that under the Premier's scheme, the projected industries in the Kootenays will require firm power from Mica Creek. How then can one reconcile regulation for downstream purposes with maximum at-site power production? Mr. Bassett replied that this could be achieved by physical and electrical interconnection. By system regulation, one could obtain the "optimum downstream use" and the "optimum at-site power". Mr. Paget added that, for example, it might be that for four months Mica could produce no firm power while it was being filled; during this period, firm power would have to come from elsewhere. During the remaining eight months, the optimum at-site power consonant with downstream regulation would be obtained from Mica. Mr. Bennett underlined that the utmost care would have to be exercised when writing this part of an agreement with the United States. Mr. Robertson wondered how one organized and achieved day to day control internationally. Mr. Paget replied that once one joins a given "pool" the matter is regulated under certain principles by a despatcher. Mr. Bennett made the point, however, that B.C. would want to keep control over the water and he would not wish to see this control leave the province. In this he was reinforced by Mr. Williston who interjected that under any international agreement, the B.C. government "will want to have a provincial body (such as a Commission or the Water Rights Branch) to enter into the necessary new agreements" when dams or new works are built along the system.

Inclusion of B.C. Representative in Team "Negotiations" with U.S.

Mr. Bennett broached the subject by saying that the province did NOT want to be on the "negotiating" team. He later said he wanted a representative available at the place of discussions for close consultation; such a representative, the Premier then said, might be included in the delegation. The Premier wanted to build co-operation and confidence between the provincial and federal authorities. Mr. Lesage said that he favoured the closest cooperation and consultation. The Department's Vancouver Office might be the main channel of consultation between officials supplemented by direct exchanges of views and visits between officials. Later, as required, there would be consultations on the ministerial level. But because he might be faced with similar demands from other provinces, Mr. Lesage did not want to commit himself on the constitution of any team which might discuss matters with the United States authorities. Mr. Lesage asked that the matter be allowed to develop and he said that he would like to discuss the matter with Mr. L.B. Pearson upon whom largely depends the constitution of international delegations.

Discussion with Officials

As agreed between Premier Bennett and Mr. Lesage, the officials mentioned above met in Mr. Bassett's office at 9.30 a.m. on July 5. Mr. Bassett informed the federal officials that on or about June 28, 1956, the Hon. Mr. Williston directed the Comptroller of Water Rights (Mr. A.F. Paget) to undertake a detailed study of the possibilities of integrating all of the Upper Columbia in B.C. and possible courses of integration or other uses with the U.S. The federal officials were informed confidentially that a firm of consultants would be retained immediately to undertake the survey, the terms of which were couched in very broad terms. Messrs. Robertson and Côté viewed this as a forward looking and sound development. The discussion then ranged over other aspects of the previous day's discussion. The viewpoints mentioned above were confirmed and all present thought that the previous day's discussions had been extremely useful.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 21, 1956

My dear Prime Minister,

I had a visit yesterday afternoon from Premier Bennett of British Columbia to discuss a number of matters of concern to British Columbia which come within the purview of this department. The most important item that was discussed was the position to be taken with regard to the Columbia River in the impending discussions with the United States.

I told Mr. Bennett that it was most important for our government to know, on a completely confidential basis, the view that his government took as to the kind of solution that would be appropriate on the Columbia. Particularly, I said, it was essential that we should know whether the provincial government, as the owner of the water resource, considered that a diversion to the Fraser River was a possible line of development. I emphasized that I would treat his views as entirely confidential and, on that basis, I had quite a useful discussion. I am enclosing herewith a note concerning it.

In view of my undertaking that this matter would be treated in the strictest confidence, I am sending copies of the enclosed note only to yourself and Mr. Pearson as the ones most immediately concerned.

Yours sincerely,

JEAN LESAGE

P.S. On reflection, I think I should also send a copy to Mr. Howe, and I am doing so.

Memorandum by Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 21, 1956

VISIT OF PREMIER W.A.C. BENNETT TO MR. LESAGE
RE COLUMBIA RIVER — NOV. 20, 1956

Premier W.A.C. Bennett of British Columbia, accompanied by Attorney General Mr. R.W. Bonner, his Deputy Minister of Finance Fisher and his Executive Assistant, Mr. Worley, saw Mr. Lesage at 3 p.m. on November 20, 1956. Also present were Messrs. R.G. Robertson and E.A. Côté.

Premier Bennett said he was anxious that the talks between Canada and the United States should get under way soon. According to Mr. Lesage, it appeared that the United States were not ready to talk yet. Later on, when pressed to say when the United States might be ready, Mr. Lesage indicated that it would be early in the new year and certainly (as Premier Bennett had hoped) the meetings would not be deferred because of federal elections. Mr. Lesage outlined to Premier Bennett, on a confidential basis, that the federal government had hired Montreal Engineering to assess the advantages and disadvantages of physical and electrical interconnections of the whole Columbia River Basin. He hoped a fairly general preliminary report would be available by January 15, 1957. Premier Bennett expressed surprise and satisfaction; he said that the studies undertaken by British Columbia consultants (Crippen & Wright) were on a quite different basis; no full report would be available for a year or two.

Mr. Lesage wondered whether Premier Bennett was opposed to a diversion (to the Fraser) "at any time". The Premier replied that he "was opposed" to a diversion. Mr. Lesage reiterated what he had told the Premier in July, namely, that nobody but the British Columbia Government could authorize such a diversion. We could not, of course, tell the Americans that the Premier was opposed to a diversion but he wanted to know the B.C. position. Premier Bennett agreed. Mr. Lesage said it would be important, even if B.C. was opposed to it as a policy, to have the diversion as "a lever" in the bargaining. For example, if Mica Creek were to be developed, B.C. might wish to receive cash on "downstream benefits" for a temporary period and then recapture the water for diversion purposes. Premier Bennett suggested that what was wanted was a combination of things: B.C. would need some power now and could take, for a time, cash in lieu of power. Later on, B.C. would want all the power. But the Premier thought that to start talking on the basis that a diversion was definitely planned to the Fraser at a later date would effectively destroy Canada's bargaining position on downstream benefits.

In answer to a question about exports of electricity, Premier Bennett said he was opposed to any export of electricity but that this did not cover exchanges of electricity via basin interconnections. In his view there must be seasonal exchanges and then downstream benefits "which were different"! Whatever the benefits, British Columbia wants them in power in the long term and it wants all at-site power retained in Canada.

Mr. Lesage thought that the Premier and he saw eye to eye on the general question when it was agreed that downstream benefits and seasonal exchanges were not the same thing but part of one transaction; what was important, as Mr. Robertson noted, was to determine the share of power attributable to Canada and its return to Canada at appropriate times in the form of power. If the respective shares could be established satisfactorily, the problem of interconnections and exchanges to achieve the maximum total power output available for sharing could be worked out as if the boundary did not exist. To this, Premier Bennett agreed. Mr. Lesage asked that the Canadian negotiators be allowed to have in hand the power to use, at an appropriate time, the possibility of the Fraser Diversion. Premier Bennett did not want this card used at the beginning: this would only make for delays and no arrangement between the countries. Mr. Robertson explained that even if one assumed, as the Premier did, that the Fraser Diversion would never be done, should the talks reveal that the United States was utterly unreasonable as to the proper return to Canada for downstream benefits, then the possibility should be open to say that the diversion would be proceeded with. Premier Bennett thought that from the very outset we should assume an attitude of cooperation and goodwill on both sides for an intelligent development of the Columbia Basin and we must seek to bring about such a development. If, however, we fail to agree with the United States, then we must look at a diversion. The Premier thought that some people had a "bug" about the diversion to the Fraser and wanted to promote the diversion. Mr. Bonner stated that to talk Fraser diversion raised the hackles of people in the Pacific Northwest; this attitude could be reflected in the U.S. negotiators if Canadians continually raise this prospect before embarking on the talks. Mr. Lesage said that the federal government was far from wedded to a diversion to the Fraser Basin; studies had not been completed to assess the respective solutions fully. In any case, whatever the federal government might conclude, a decision to divert was one for the province. However, the Canadian negotiators should have this argument in the background in case a satisfactory solution is not forthcoming. Premier Bennett drew a parallel between the four years it has taken to establish confidence between the federal and provincial governments on this subject and the necessity for starting to deal with the United States from a base of "mutual goodwill, confidence and cooperation". Having done so, if the United States got "too tough", then, said the Premier, it's "no dice"! Mr. Lesage said he and the Premier understood one another on this point.

Premier Bennett propounded the theory that B.C. had spent some time in seeking to have the United States agree that downstream benefits were worth something. This has now been agreed on the United States' side. Mr. Robertson suggested that we probably won't know until well on in the talks "how reasonable the United States are likely to be". Mr. Lesage thought that the United States would also want to discuss concrete Canadian plans. Premier Bennett thought that the United States want an abundance of firm power. In the initial phases, B.C. might assist in getting things moving if it accepted some cash and power for a short while. Thinking aloud, he suggested that the province could get all the firm, at-site power and, of the downstream benefits, say 40% could be taken initially in power and 60% in cash each month; when the installations have been paid for, then the 60% would be remitted in power. The Premier agreed with Mr. Robertson's suggestion that a firm cut-off period would be required depending on a shrewd guess as to the length of time the province could do without its full share of power. This might be much shorter than the financing period.

On the subject of the possible diversion of the headwaters of the Kootenay into the Columbia at Canal Flats, Premier Bennett agreed with Mr. Lesage that the same objections did not apply as in the case of the proposed diversion to the Fraser. Premier Bennett believed that Canada should enter into the talks with the spirit on wanting to find a solution in the Columbia in good faith. He seemed pleased to learn from Mr. Robertson that Montreal Engineering was being asked to consider two cases: a diversion of the Kootenay in conjunction with an integrated development the whole of the Columbia and an integrated development of the Columbia alone without the diversion.

Premier Bennett thought it should be made abundantly and publicly clear that a Columbia settlement is not to be tied to Canadian-U.S. trade relations. Mr. Lesage agreed that the Columbia matter should be discussed entirely on its own merits.

Both Mr. Lesage and Premier Bennett expressed satisfaction concerning this exchange of views.

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES ON WATERS CROSSING THE BOUNDARY

On February 23, 1956, Cabinet agreed in principle that discussions should be initiated with the United States on a government-to-government basis for the purpose of working out principles to be applied to downstream benefits, diversions of water and other water power problems arising in the case of rivers crossing the international boundary.

2. At that time, Cabinet also instructed the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy to work out recommendations as to the basis for opening discussions and as to the course that should be followed in carrying them out. The Committee has put in hand studies which should yield, in the not too distant future, the necessary information on which to base recommendations to Cabinet. These studies range from a compilation of geographical, hydrologic and historical data to examination of the economic, legal and power system problems.

3. After Canada and the United States had agreed to the talks, this fact was made public through an announcement made by the undersigned in the House of Commons on May 23, 1956. In making the announcement, the undersigned stated that both governments believed that "a full and confidential exchange of views" might help solve the problems arising out of waters flowing across the boundary such as the Columbia, the Saint John and the Yukon Rivers. At the same time, I stated that "the two governments desire that the International Joint Commission shall press forward its studies under the Columbia River Reference of 1944...".

4. It was on March 9, 1944, that both these governments had agreed upon a joint reference being made to the International Joint Commission for the purpose of determining "whether a greater use than is now being made of the waters of the Columbia River system would be feasible and advantageous..." The Commission was thus requested to > "determine whether in its judgment further development of the water resources of the river basin would be practicable and in the public interest from the points of view of the two Governments..."

and, if further works or projects are found to be feasible and desirable, the Commission was asked to > "indicate how the interest on either side of the boundary would be benefited or adversely affected thereby."[188]

5. At the semi-annual meeting of the International Joint Commission on October 5, 1956, the Commission discussed the manner in which it should assess various storage possibilities in the Columbia Basin in both countries. The United States Section asked for information about plans for Canadian storage, including the method of operation and the periods during which regulated flows from such storage would be available to the United States. Very briefly, the Chairman of the Canadian Section pointed out that the resources are owned by the provinces but suggested that the Canadian "group who are concerned with these general plans that carry into the future" might... "give us as authoritative a statement as they can in relation to our own plans as to when we would feel it necessary to divert these flows...". The Canadian Chairman repeated the view which he had expressed to the Commission and to the House of Commons' Committee on External Affairs in April and May, 1955, that regulated flows from Canadian storage should be made available, for appropriate recompense, only until such time as the water is required for diversion to the Fraser River Basin.

6. On October 26, 1956, the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, wrote the attached letter to the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy. In this letter General McNaughton asked consideration of this matter in the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy, "where ... sufficiently firm conclusions might be reached to establish a basis of discussion in the International Joint Commission". In this way, discussions might be arranged to go forward "in a joint economic group" to consider the "fair recompense" to Canada for Canadian resources and services provided to the United States. In bringing this matter to the Committee, General McNaughton indicated that renewed U.S. interest may have arisen because of the United States anxiety over floods in the Kootenai and the Columbia and of the understanding by the Americans — possibly for the first time — of the benefits that would accrue if Canada withheld water from the flood crests by providing storage. The use of storage for flood protection is not limited by a possible diversion to the Fraser River Basin.

7. The matter was considered by the Advisory Committee on November 8. From the discussion it appears that points of major policy require consideration. Two viewpoints were put forward:

(a) One was that if the Committee prepared a statement for use by the Canadian Chairman in the International Joint Commission, this statement would be accepted as the view of the Canadian government. In that case, Canada's tactics in the impending diplomatic talks would have to be based on this statement which itself would be predicated on the diversion of Columbia River waters to the Fraser River Basin.

(b) Another viewpoint was that both the Canadian and the United States governments had given the International Joint Commission the task of determining whether, in its judgment, further development of the waters of the Columbia would be practicable and in the public interest from the points of view of the two governments and, if so, the effects of such developments on either side of the boundary. One important factor which the Commission would wish to consider is the effects of a diversion of waters to the Fraser Basin. Under this viewpoint, unless the United States government is convinced that Canada will, in the absence of any other satisfactory arrangement, make the diversion to the Fraser Basin, there will be no incentive for her to agree to provide recompense for regulated flows from Canada. Both British Columbia and Canada have asserted this principle of recompense in statements filed with the I.J.C. in response to the U.S. application for Libby Dam. In the absence of agreement, the United States would receive the regulated flows automatically when Canadian storage is built. It this view and under these circumstances, it would be important to provide the Commission with an authoritative statement putting forth a Canadian time-phased plan of diversions from the Kootenay to the Columbia and from the Columbia to the Fraser for use as a basis of discussion in the Commission.

8. The Chairman of the Canadian Section, International Joint Commission, has since suggested a line of approach, based on the statement made by Governor Jordan, the Chairman of the U.S. Section, I.J.C., at the meeting of the Commission on 5 October, 1956 when he said:

> "We do not care to debate with you or your colleagues whether or not you should divert. That is a decision you shall make for yourselves, and you alone will make it. But we are ready and willing and eager to discuss the development of the Columbia River in the Columbia Basin, and following that we are awaiting your decision as to diversion..."

To follow up this suggestion it might be agreed by Cabinet that in opening the diplomatic discussions the Canadian spokesman would say the matter of concern to Canada in the Columbia and adjacent basins is that the people of Canada should derive all due benefits from the water resources of Canada, and the Government of Canada is not at this stage concerned whether this result comes about by reason of the more effective use of the waters of the Columbia by diversion to the Fraser for the regulation of that river, or by recompense in power for the benefits conferred downstream in the United States consequent on the provision of flows which have been regulated in Canadian storages, or by reason of the integration of power plants in either country to the advantage of both or the like. However, the Government of Canada would much prefer to see an arrangement which, while providing for the people of Canada the maximum benefit from Canadian water resources, would at the same time result in as great a benefit as possible to the people of the United States. It could be suggested that the first step should be for the United States Government, in line with the above-quoted statement of the Chairman of the U.S. Section, I.J.C., to propose a plan of mutual benefit for the development of the waters of the Columbia basin within that basin. The spokesman might go on to say that the Canadian Government is willing to proceed with the exploration of these possibilities in these diplomatic discussions or alternatively to suggest to the Canadian Section I.J.C. that this be done in the I.J.C.

9. It would, however, have to be made clear that Canada entirely reserves her position and her rights, more particularly under Article II of the Treaty of 1909 by which "exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters..." has been reserved to Canada and the provinces. The spokesman might also say that the proposal for the use of the waters of the Kootenay within the Columbia Basin in Canada through the proposed Canadian plants downstream on the Columbia to the boundary is to be considered. In addition to asserting the rights reserved to Canada under the Treaty of 1909, this procedure would give an opportunity to the United States Government to make proposals which might prove to be acceptable to the Governments of British Columbia and Canada. The Canadian and British Columbia Governments could weigh the advantages to Canada which have been offered by the United States as against the advantages which would accrue to Canada from the alternative developments made possible by a diversion to the Fraser, and thereupon reach a conclusion as to action to be taken in the public interest of Canada.

Recommendations

10. In the light of the Cabinet decisions of 1944 and 1956 and of all pertinent factors, the undersigned suggests that these matters should receive early consideration by Cabinet.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN LESAGE

[ANNEXE A/ANNEX A]

Le président de la Section canadienne de la Commission mixte internationale au président du Comité consultatif sur la politique relative à l'utilisation de l'eau

Chairman, Canadian Section, International Joint Commission, to Chairman, Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 26, 1956

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I refer to the official record of the discussions which took place in the International Joint Commission on Friday 5 October, 1956, in respect to the Columbia River Reference (1944).

The aspect of primary importance which came under debate on this occasion was the question of continuing discussions in the Commission of the proposal for developments on the Columbia and the Fraser which the Canadian Section first put forward in April, 1955. You will recall that these proposals included the development of the Bull River-Luxor and Mica Creek Reservoirs with a total capacity of some 15 million acre-feet and the eventual diversion of water stored in these reservoirs to the Thompson-Fraser system for regulation. In explaining this proposal to the United States Section at the time I suggested that it might be possible to build the Mica Reservoir in anticipation of the time when the stored water would be required for diversion and to make this water available in the interim, for due and proper recompense, to provide regulated flow for use of the power plants on the United States portion of the Columbia River. I went on to say that if these reservoirs were built in the near future this arrangement would provide material assistance to the United States in the period in which a heavy power deficiency in the Pacific North-west States is forecast and would give the Pacific Northwest a breathing spell in which to develop alternative storage in the United States portion of the basin. I emphasized, of course, the temporary character of this aid and that we would need assurance that the United States would proceed with developments in replacement.

In the discussion on 5 October last Governor Jordan stated that the U.S. Section would be prepared to consider these possibilities provided that the Canadian Section would give an indication of the amounts of regulated flow which might be supplied, the period in which these flows would be available and the conditions of regulation which would be in effect.

I believe that this expression of interest is prompted primarily by reason of the rising anxieties in the United States over flood control, both on the Columbia itself and also on the Kootenay, and in this connection may I invite your attention to page 442 of the record where, in regard to the Kootenay valley, Governor Jordan said that "they have a desperate situation which can only be met either by storage or by diversion." If you will refer to the record you will note that by this Governor Jordan means either the Libby Dam or the diversion of the Kootenay to the Columbia at Canal Flats; clearly the U.S. Section is anxious for a decision on this by Canada in one way or the other.

As regards the acuteness of the flood problem in the Columbia: In the 1894 flood the river had a maximum flow of 1,240,000 cubic feet per second at the Dalles, and some 5 million dollars of damage is reported to have occurred. It has recently been estimated by U.S. authorities that if this same flood occurred today the damage would amount to 350 million dollars, that is, an increase by a factor of 70.

The main control plan recommended in the United States Corps of Engineers Report on the Columbia River, H.D.531, stated a requirement of 27 million acre-feet of upstream storage to reduce Columbia flooding to tolerable proportions. As matters stand, the United States has about 9 1/2 million acre-feet on the main stem of which, even with the extensive and expensive changes being made on the Grand Coulee Dam, perhaps no more than 5 million acre-feet could be operated to reduce possible peak flows.

The various storages included in the proposals put forward by the Canadian Section IJC in April 1955 comprise a total of 2.3 million acre-feet in major projects only in Canada, and much of this could be operated by Canada to assist with flood control downstream by the withholding of water from the flood crests. The reservoirs, when thus filled, would then be available for downstream regulation for the benefit of power.

In addition, under the Canadian proposal the United States could add 3.3 million acre-feet to Grand Coulee and construct 1.7 million acre-feet at Libby, a total of 5.0 million acre-feet not otherwise possible.

It seems that the United States has now, perhaps for the first time, grasped the significance of the very extensive benefit which Canada is in a position to give in this matter, and which it appears is not otherwise practicable of attainment at this time, and that this is the principal reason for the renewed interest being shown in our proposals.

I believe that we should be responsive to this interest, and to this end I am anxious to explore the matter in the International Joint Commission. Because of the urgency of the problem of flood protection on the Kootenay I feel that in this exploration we must consider both the Kootenay diversion and the Mica Reservoir.

These two projects together are capable of withholding some 15 million acre-feet from the river flows and much of this, by appropriate arrangement, can be drawn from the flood crests.

Based on the forecast of power loads in south western British Columbia recently given by the President of B.C. Electric and assuming the use of Mica, Priest Rapids and Murphy Creek for at-site power, and including the completion of the Canadian plants on the Pend d'oreille to serve developments in the Kootenay area, I have thought, having in mind a progressive development of the Fraser-Thompson plants coming in after the power from the Mica group has been absorbed, that we could contemplate three states in the diversion of the flows from Mica and Bull River-Luxor Reservoirs. This would mean these flows would be available to the United States as I indicated on page 445: 5 million for quite an extended period, 10 million for a rather less period, and an initial period when 15 million would be available. I have thought the period when 15 million acre-feet would be available for downstream power benefit and/or as storage for flood relief might be about 15 years from the completion of Mica, with 5 years for each of the two succeeding phases. If Mica and Bull River-Luxor projects were started in 1958, some 3.4 million acre-feet from Bull River-Luxor could be available in 1963; 11.8 million acre-feet could be added from Mica in 1966, making some 15 million acre-feet which would be available for say 15 years, that is, to 1981. Then the regulated flow down the Columbia to the United States might decrease to 10 million acre-feet for 5 years until about 1986; then to 5 million acre-feet for another 5 years, that is, until about 1991, when it would cease.

Such an arrangement of dates for the taking into use in the Fraser of the waters of the Columbia which might be diverted from the Bull River-Luxor and Mica Reservoirs comprehends the earliest construction of these reservoirs which is practicable; then a period of full use of the water downstream followed by a period of progressive reduction which will give the United States time to construct equivalent reservoir capacity in their own part of the Columbia basin. The period in which I suggest these reductions would take place would coincide with a period in which very rapid development of the Vancouver load requirement is forecast and in this period the additional regulation of the plants on the Thompson-Fraser system provided by the diversions from the Kootenay and Columbia would be particularly useful.

It is on the basis of such generalizations that I have mentioned 1991 as the date on which the diversions into the Thompson-Fraser should be made fully effective.

The fair bargain which we would need to make would provide both for downstream benefits to United States power plants from regulated flow and recompense for the use of storage, possibly partly alternative to power benefits, for flood protection.

You will note that on page 446 of the record I have undertaken to endeavour to put myself in a position to make a statement on this prospect in the near future, but before doing this I would, of course, hope the matter would receive consideration in the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy, where I think with the information and forecasts now available sufficiently firm conclusions might be reached to establish a basis of discussion in the International Joint Commission. This being done might permit discussions to forward usefully in a joint economic group to consider what would constitute a fair recompense to Canada for the use of Canadian resources and for services rendered and for costs incurred by projects built ahead of Canadian requirements in order to help the United States in flood protection and power benefits in the interim.

In order to help in any consideration of this matter in the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy I have had prepared an abbreviated account† of the International Joint Commission session on 5 October last in which the record is reduced to the observations relevant to this issue only. A copy of this I enclose herewith, and other copies are available as you may require.

Yours sincerely,

A.G.L. McNAUGHTON

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES; DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES ON WATERS CROSSING THE BOUNDARY (PREVIOUS REFERENCE FEB. 23)

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Dec. 13, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 251-56).

35. Mr. Lesage added that, in his recent talks, the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, had expressed his opposition to a diversion of waters from the Columbia to the Fraser, but had agreed not to take an official stand on the issue at this stage. On the other hand, if the Canadian government decided to base its case on such a diversion before the diplomatic discussions were initiated, Mr. Bennett would certainly make public his unwillingness to agree to such action. Meanwhile, the British Columbia Electric Company and Montreal Engineering were proceeding with preliminary studies on the physical and economic possibilities of a diversion to the Fraser River and on possible interconnections and integration within the Columbia Basin. Their reports would be ready by January 15th, 1957.

36. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was no justification for changing the decision that the question of waters crossing the international boundary be discussed through diplomatic channels. It would be desirable for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to state the views of the government of Canada at the opening of these talks.

(b) It would be undesirable to base the Canadian case on the Columbia diversion to the Fraser River at the beginning of those diplomatic discussions. While this proposal seemed impractical, it would be unwise to take a decision or to make a statement on this issue before the results of the studies now being made became available.

37. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National resources on discussions with the United States about waters crossing the boundary, and re-affirmed the decision that such discussions take place through diplomatic channels rather than in the International Joint Commission, it being understood that the Canadian position on the diversion of waters from the Columbia River to the Fraser Basin would be defined later in the light of the results of studies new being made in this matter.

WATERS CROSSING THE BOUNDARY; DISCUSSIONS WITH THE U.S.
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 7)

15. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources said that a preliminary meeting of officials of the United States and Canada had been held on waters crossing the international boundary in Ottawa on March 19th. As a result, the following terms of reference were proposed for the main discussions:

(1) To examine, in the light of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, the subject of waters which flowed across the boundary between Canada and the United States with a view to reaching mutual understanding of the nature and extent of the questions involved.

(2) To examine in particular the effects, both beneficial and adverse, in the downstream country, of actions in the upstream country involving waters which crossed the international boundary, with a view to considering possible arrangements for appropriate adjustments.

(3) To examine other related questions which might arise.

Officials thought that there might be a meeting at ministerial level in Washington in May and another one in the fall in Ottawa. They were submitting to the two governments for consideration the following draft agenda for the May meeting:

(1) Terms of reference.

(2) Nature of questions involved in the subject of waters flowing across the international boundary.

(3) Examples of types of questions involved under item (2).

(4) Arrangements for future discussions and for exchange of information.

The terms of reference and the draft agenda had been found satisfactory by the Advisory Committee on Water Use Policy and had also been discussed with officials of British Columbia. It was suggested that the major part of the May meeting would revolve around the last item of the agenda regarding future discussions.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 26, 1957 — Cab. Doc. 68-57†)

16. Mr. Lesage added that he would be prepared to head the Canadian delegation at the May meeting, and that it should be agreed at the meeting that the optimum development of the whole Columbia River Basin should be examined as an integrated system and as if there were no boundary. If this question were recognized as being an important aspect of the problem under discussion, it might then be useful to suggest at an early date to the U.S. representatives that a small joint committee of experts be set up to study the implications of the physical and electrical integration of this basin. When this information was available, it would be easier to assess the advantages which Canada would derive against what could be done entirely within the country. If this approach were acceptable, it would seem appropriate to have D.M. Stephens, Chairman and General Manager of the Manitoba Hydro Electric Board, A.F. Paget, Comptroller of Water Rights for British Columbia, and Dr. Gaherty, of Montreal Engineering, as Canadian representatives on this joint committee.

The Minister also intended to make a short statement in the House on the meeting of officials held on March 19th. He would merely say that the meeting had been very successful and that proposed terms of reference had been drawn up for the ministerial meeting to be held in May in Washington.

17. During the discussion it was pointed out that there could not be any provincial representation in the Canadian delegation at those talks. However, the provinces, and British Columbia in particular, could send representatives to Washington in May for consultation with the Canadian delegation during the meeting.

18. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on discussions with the United States on waters crossing the boundary and agreed,

(a) that a meeting at the ministerial level be held in Washington in May to consider the terms of reference and the agenda suggested above; and,

(b) that a statement be made in the House of Commons on the results of the March meeting of officials in Ottawa and to announce the ministerial meeting in Washington in May.[189]

Item 1 – Welcome by Chairman

The Chairman, Mr. John Wesley Jones, extended a warm welcome to the Canadian group. He recalled that the origin of these discussions was the meeting between Prime Minister St. Laurent and President Eisenhower at White Sulphur Springs about a year ago. The Chairman noted that the initial meeting had been held in March in Ottawa and that Canadian and United States officials had agreed on tentative Terms of Reference and on a draft Agenda for this meeting.

At the March meeting a decision had also been taken to prepare working papers on the subject of waters flowing across the boundary. The United States group was to prepare a paper on the "Nature of questions involved in the subject of waters which flow across the international boundary", and the Canadian group was to write a paper on "Examples of types of questions involved in the subject of waters which flow across the international boundary".

Item 2 – Response by Mr. Lesage

Mr. Lesage thanked the Chairman for the words of welcome and underlined that the Canadian Government has a sense of urgency regarding certain questions arising out of problems involving the development of waters which cross our common boundary.

The Chairman presented the following draft agenda which was accepted:

AGENDA

(1) Welcome to the Canadian delegation by Deputy Assistant Secretary John Wesley Jones;

(2) Response by the Honourable Jean Lesage;

(3) Approval of the Minutes of March 19th meeting;

(4) Discussion of Terms of Reference;

(5) Major questions involved in the subject of waters crossing the boundary;

(6) Examples of the type of questions involved in Agenda item No. 5;

(7) General discussion;

(8) Statement for the Press.

Item 3 – Minutes of March 19, 1957 Meeting†

The Minutes of the meeting held in Ottawa on March 19 were approved without addition or correction.

Item 4 – Terms of Reference

The suggested revisions made by the United States group to the proposed Terms of Reference agreed upon ad referendum at the March 19 Ottawa meeting formed the basis for discussion.

SUGGESTED REVISION OF PROPOSED "TERMS OF REFERENCE" (UNDERSCORING DENOTES ADDITIONS AND OVERDASHING DENOTES DELETIONS)

1. To examine, in the light of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 and other pertinent considerations, the subject of waters which flow across the boundary between Canada and the United States with a view to reaching mutual understanding of the nature and extent of the questions involved.

2. To examine in particular the effects, both beneficial and adverse, in both the downstream and upstream countries of actions in the upstream country involving waters which cross the international boundary with a view to considering principles and procedures possible arrangements for appropriate adjustments.

3. To examine other related questions which may arise in giving consideration to such international rivers.

Paragraph (1): The Canadian group asked for clarification of the meaning of the words "and other pertinent considerations" and emphasized that Canada had no intention of opening a discussion of the Boundary Waters Treaty itself. In response the United States group gave assurances that there was no intention of opening the question of amending the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. The United States official indicated that the Boundary Waters Treaty was not the only document that had a bearing on these talks and they did not wish to exclude "other pertinent considerations". As a specific example it was pointed out that the question of downstream benefits was not mentioned in the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. Therefore, if the Terms of Reference limited the negotiators to an examination of this question only in the light of the Treaty this might mean that the important question of downstream benefits could not be taken into account. It was thought that the proposed amendment was a useful broadening of the Terms of Reference. The Canadian group indicated that it was their impression that the question of downstream benefits was a logical consequence of certain terms of the Boundary Waters Treaty.

Following the above discussion, it was agreed that the first Term of Reference should be amended to read "To examine in the light of the Boundary Waters Treaty and other pertinent considerations within the framework of that Treaty ... ".

Paragraph (2): The Canadian group asked why the United States proposed to substitute the words "principles and procedures" for "possible arrangements" in the second Term of Reference.

The United States group said that it believed that the words "possible arrangements" might be construed to mean that the discussions were designed to draft an arrangement for a specific settlement whereas the United States group believed the intent of the talks was to establish principles and procedures on which specific arrangements are worked out at a later time. The Canadian group suggested that any possible arrangements must necessarily vary from one situation to another. For example, the Columbia, the Yukon and the Saint John are all specific cases that require particular arrangements for settlement.

The United States group made reference to a Note from the Canadian Embassy dated March 15, 1956, which emphasized the desirability of arriving at certain principles. The Canadians said that this was true but that since March 1956 they had applied themselves to an examination of how principles might best be arrived at to settle the questions involved. The Canadian group now believed that it would be difficult to deduce principles without examining specific cases. The Canadian group suggested that the inductive method might be a more fruitful avenue of approach. For example a detailed investigation of the development possibilities of the Columbia River Basin might lead to an arrangement out of which certain principles might evolve which could be applied to other cases. In this connection it was pointed out that the same procedure had been used in negotiating various fisheries conventions. Specific problems were settled by a series of arrangements through which runs a set of common principles.

After further discussion the phrase "principles and possible arrangements" was accepted.

The Canadian group then asked why the United States proposed in the second Term of Reference to add the words "in both the downstream and upstream countries". The United States group said that this change was meant to take into account the situation in which a river, e.g., the Kootenay, crosses and recrosses the boundary. In these situations actions in the upstream country would have effects in both countries. The Canadian group said that they recognized that in one case Canada might be the upstream country and in another the downstream country.

The amendment was accepted and it was also agreed to delete after the word "actions" the words "in the upstream country".

Paragraph (3): The proposed United States amendment to delete the word "related" and to add the words "in giving consideration to such international rivers" was accepted with the exception that the final word "rivers" was changed to "waters".

In summary, the following Terms of Reference agreed upon now read:

(1) To examine in the light of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 and other pertinent considerations within the framework of that Treaty, the subject of waters which flow across the boundary between Canada and the United States with a view to reaching mutual understanding of the nature and extent of the questions involved.

(2) To examine in particular the effects, beneficial and adverse, in both the downstream and upstream countries, of actions involving waters which cross the international boundary, with a view to considering principles and possible arrangements for appropriate adjustments.

(3) To examine other questions which may arise in giving consideration to such international waters.

Item 5 – United States Paper†

The United States delegation presented a paper which discussed briefly and in general terms possible questions which could arise out of the development or use of waters which cross the international boundary. In connection with Point 10 of the United States working paper, the United States group stated that while the United States would have no objections to considering possible arrangements for one specific case such as the Columbia River, the United States would want to examine those arrangements in the context of other international waters. The Canadian group acknowledged this point and asserted that any possible arrangements for one river would set a precedent which would have to be taken into account when similar situations involving other rivers were considered.

Item 6 – Canadian Paper†

The Canadian delegation presented a working paper which listed some 240 waters which cross the international boundary. The paper pointed up, where appropriate, the international significance of these waters. The Canadian group said that any views which the United States group might have with respect to the paper would be welcome. One suggestion made was that the Canadian paper include a section on the Richelieu River.

The United States side agreed to study the Canadian document and send any comments through regular, i.e., diplomatic channels.

Item 7 – General Discussion

The Chairman of the Canadian group emphasized that Canada wished to study all problems in one specific basin and then see how any other basins would be affected by any agreement that might be reached. In Canada the Columbia River was considered to be very important at this time and it was thought that the United States Pacific Northwest was also interested in developing the Columbia River.

Mr. Lesage said that the Canadian Government, in considering the development of the Columbia River and its tributaries, is faced with three broad alternatives:

(1) The diversion of some water of the Columbia River into the Fraser River system;

(2) Independent development of the Columbia River Basin in Canada for maximum benefits to Canada; and

(3) An integrated development of the Columbia River basin with a view to obtaining the optimum economic benefits in both the United States and Canada.

Studies of the first and second alternatives are already in progress in Canada.

To estimate the order of magnitude of the economic benefits from the third alternative, the Canadian Government thought it desirable to establish a national working group of engineers. Mr. Lesage did not know whether the United States wanted to establish a similar group but he was anxious that the Canadian working group should have a point of contact in the United States where it could get authoritative information. The Canadian group would study the order of magnitude of the benefits which could accrue to both countries by an integrated development of the Columbia. The Canadian Government was interested in this type of study in order to be able to evaluate advantages to Canada of this alternative.

This Canadian group would be made up of three engineers from outside the federal government service. Mr. Lesage said this approach to the problem had already been approved by the Canadian Government. He outlined the purpose of the Canadian working group along the following general lines:

(1) To examine, on the basis of available information, different plans for an integrated development of the Columbia River Basin;

(2) To estimate the possible order of magnitude of the benefits that might be derived from each of the plans for integrated development which appear to be most promising;

(3) To report to the Canadian Government.

Following discussion it was recognized that conduct of studies of the foregoing nature in either country would require arrangements to facilitate exchange of pertinent available data.

In summarizing the United States position Mr. Jones said he was pleased to find that the concensus of the United States group favoured the objectives in principle. However, in view of the several agencies involved and the policy implications it would be necessary to consider the matter further and provide an official reply later through diplomatic channels.

It was explained that if the United States were to set up a working group or point of contact it might well be composed of government officials. The United States might wish to enlist Canadian cooperation in making similar studies of areas other than the Columbia River basin such as the Yukon and Saint John.

Mr. Lesage pointed out that Canada had previously agreed to cooperate in exchanging data on the Yukon and that his Water Resources Branch was in a position to furnish data on the Saint John as a result of recent studies under International Joint Commission auspices.

Item 8 – Statement for the Press

A draft press release was considered and approved.

Tuesday Morning May 21st

During the discussion of item 7 of the Minutes relating to the order of magnitude of benefits from integrated development, one member of the United States group pointed out that during the discussion the term "integrated" had been used frequently with reference to the Columbia River basin. He thought it would be desirable to have clarification of what was meant by this term. The United States Department of Interior, for example, is interested not only in power but also flood control, navigation, fish and wildlife, recreation and other uses. Therefore, it is important to know whether the term "integrated" refers to the optimum development of resources for all the uses and not just for power.

This point was considered a matter which should be given careful consideration at a later time.

The meeting adjourned at 12 p.m.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 15-56 Ottawa, January 25, 1956

PEACE BRIDGE BETWEEN FORT ERIE AND BUFFALO

I. BACKGROUND

The Peace Bridge across the Niagara River connecting Fort Erie, Ontario, with Buffalo, New York, is owned and managed by the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, and given authority by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed in 1933, and an act of the Parliament of Canada, passed in 1934. The Authority is composed of six residents of the United States appointed by the Governor of the State of New York and three residents of Canada appointed by the Governor in Council. The purpose of the Authority and its predecessor companies was to erect an international bridge across the Niagara River as a memorial to a century of peace between the two countries, the money to be raised by public-spirited persons and the bridge to become toll-free upon the liquidation of the debt incurred in its construction. Most of the capital was subscribed in the United States and most of the bonds now outstanding are held in the United States.

2. The bridge was not a profitable enterprise during the depression of the 1930's, but in recent years it has been showing a net surplus which in each of the calendar years 1953 and 1954 exceeded $550,000. Under existing legislation the assets on either side of the boundary revert respectively to Canada and the State of New York upon retirement of the bonded indebtedness of the Authority. The bonds now outstanding must be retired not later than January 1, 1962, and could be retired as soon as enough money is in hand if the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority so wished. Calculations suggest that retirement would be possible by January 1957.

II. SOURCE OF THE PROBLEM

3. Buffalo used to be the fifth largest port in the United States but now rates about twentieth. In an endeavour to improve its position, the city has, since 1928, been trying to promote a port authority along the lines of the New York Port Authority. Six attempts have been made to secure legislation from the State of New York to establish a Buffalo port authority but all of these bills failed, apparently because the legislature was not satisfied that the projects would be self-supporting. On February 22, 1955, the State Legislature unanimously approved a bill providing for the establishment of a Niagara Frontier Port Authority. The new feature in this bill (which has the approval of the Governor of New York) is the inclusion in the Niagara Frontier Port Authority of what is known as the "bridge project", i.e., the Peace Bridge. The bridge project is expected to supply a steady source of income which will make grants from the State budget unnecessary and to provide an asset which will permit bonds to be floated to finance capital expenditures.

4. The New York State Act of 1955 touches upon Canadian interests in several respects. It provides that the Port Authority is to be composed of eight members appointed by the Governor of New York from the Buffalo district and three members appointed by the Government of Canada. Under the Act as it now stands, the three Canadian members would act only in respect of matters affecting that portion of the Peace Bridge which is situated within Canada. (Buffalo officials have since indicated their willingness to have Canada have an equal voice in the control of the bridge.) The New York Act by implication recognizes the reversionary interest of Canada in the part of the bridge which is in Canadian territory, and provides that the New Authority should act as "the agency or instrumentality" of Canada in respect of the assets and property situated in Canada. The Attorney-General of the State of New York in a written opinion on the New York Act stated that the State Legislature could take no action purporting to alter the existing status of the Peace Bridge without the consent of the Parliament of Canada and the Congress of the United States.

5. Representatives of the State of New York and the City of Buffalo, with the support of the United States Embassy, have asked that the Government of Canada approve the proposed changes in the régime of the Peace Bridge and extend such co-operation as is necessary to permit the bridge project to be included in the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. They have stated that the Port Authority could not function unless it included the bridge project, and that without it the whole scheme would collapse. They also stated that the terms of the trust indenture which accompanied the issuance of bridge bonds in 1946 make it necessary that the bridge and the port be included under one authority if the New York share of bridge revenues is to support the port project. They have said that two legally separate but related corporations would not meet their requirements. It is the request of the New York and Buffalo authorities that the Government of Canada will secure such Canadian legislation as may be necessary in order to allow the bridge project to be brought within the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, and that it will agree that the bridge should not become toll-free but should be used as a source of revenue the net surplus being divided equally between Canada and the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. The New York interests have estimated that even with a decrease in tolls from the present basic toll of 25¢ to 15¢, an annual net surplus of the order of $600,000 could be realized after bonds have been redeemed. No figures have been produced to justify this assertion.

6. The same interests have asked that the Canadian Government take action to enable the bridge project to become part of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority as soon as possible. The Port Authority is now in being, as the United States members have been appointed. They will take control of all their other assets by July 1, 1956, and say that they will need to be able to use their portion of the bridge as security for bonds to raise money to inaugurate their programme of capital improvements in the port. The New York interests have further represented that if the scheme fails because the Niagara Frontier Port Authority is unable to have the use of the United States portion of the bridge (and on time), the opportunity will probably be forever lost because supporters of the New York Thruway will then persuade the legislature that it should turn the New York interest in the bridge over to the Thruway and abandon the Buffalo Port Authority scheme.

III. QUESTIONS FOR DECISION

7. The desire of the State of New York and the City of Buffalo to alter the existing arrangement for operation of the Peace Bridge raises two principal questions:

(a) Is the Government of Canada willing, subject to the passage of the necessary legislation by Parliament, to accede to the United States desire that the Peace Bridge should be operated as a toll bridge with the object of making a profit?

(b) If the answer to the previous question is affirmative, what form should co-operation with the State of New York take to achieve this aim?

Discussion

8. The following are arguments in favour of operating the Peace Bridge as a profit-making toll bridge:

(a) If the Peace Bridge were toll-free, or if the toll were merely sufficient to cover operation and maintenance, it would be difficult to arrange, in the future, for the financing of an additional bridge in the area by private capital when increased road traffic requires an additional bridge. The federal government could expect to be asked either to reimpose a high rate of tolls or to finance half the cost of a new bridge. It could also expect to be asked to pay the cost of improving facilities on the Canadian side to take care of increased traffic over the existing bridge.

(b) Refusal to agree that the bridge should be operated as a profit-making toll bridge may be expected to generate considerable ill-will towards Canada in the Buffalo area. While there appears to be some doubt in New York as to the entity which should receive the profits from the United States interest in the bridge, there does not appear to be much doubt that the bridge should be a profit-making toll bridge.

9. The following are arguments against operating the Peace Bridge as a profit-making toll bridge:

(a) Profit-making will be a contravention of the original intent of those who conceived the idea of the Peace Bridge and subscribed the money to build it.

(b) There may be some doubt as to the propriety of levying tolls on the bridge to raise money for a purpose not connected with the bridge.

(c) Operating the bridge as a profit-making enterprise creates a need to find some method of using the Canadian share of the profits. It could be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, used for some local scheme for development, or paid into a fund for building an additional bridge in the future. All of these suggestions have drawbacks.

10. On balance, it seems advisable to accede to the American wish that the bridge be operated to provide a profit. If the Canadian Government refused to co-operate to the extent of agreeing that profit-making tolls should be charged, it might find that the New York interests would unilaterally terminate the present arrangement and impose tolls on their half of the bridge. The levying of tolls for profit on the American side appears in any case to be practically inevitable. The smaller the Canadian toll, the larger the American toll can be. The Canadian Government could thus be indirectly subsidizing the beneficiary of the American tolls. Moreover, refusing to allow the Peace Bridge to become an asset of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority will probably create considerable ill-will without aggravating the situation by refusing to agree to levy tolls for profit.

11. Three possible ways of working out an agreement with the New York authorities for a profit-making régime for the bridge are:

(a) The Canadian Government could agree to some suitable modification of the plan proposed by the New York authorities in connection with the Niagara Frontier Port Authority.

(b) The Canadian Government could agree to the operation of the bridge for profit by a separate corporation which could turn over half of the profits to the Niagara Frontier Port Authority and half to some agency designated by the Canadian Government.

(c) The Canadian Government could agree that tolls should be levied for profit, but suggest that each government own and operate its portion of the bridge separately, with certain functions being co-ordinated by agreement.

These possibilities are discussed below.

12. The New York Plan. It would be possible to make numerous modifications in the plan set forth in the law passed by the New York State legislature in February, 1955, in such a manner as to protect Canadian interests and ensure proper control and management. The argument in favour of co-operation along the lines of the New York plan, suitably modified, is based entirely on considerations of goodwill. Such press reports from the Buffalo area as have been seen suggest that Canadian refusal to fall in with the Niagara Frontier Port Authority scheme will be viewed as unco-operative in the Buffalo area. There will be a tendency to ask what more Canada could seek than the free gift of title to half the bridge, free use of half the profits, and an equal voice in the control of the bridge.

13. The arguments against co-operation through the New York plan are:

(a) The Canadian Government would be agreeing to an arrangement whereby Canadians would be appointed to an Authority the main purpose of which would be the improvement of the Port of Buffalo. The fact that their participation would be of the most indirect sort would probably not be apparent to the public; the whole New York scheme is based on a desire to make the Peace Bridge appear to be part and parcel of the Port Authority. On grounds of principle such an arrangement is probably unsound.

(b) The Canadian public would probably not be able to understand why the Canadian Government had agreed to place the Canadian portion of the bridge under a United States authority.

(c) The Canadian Government would be agreeing to an arrangement which appears to place the bridge under the Niagara Frontier Port Authority while really creating what amounts to a separate corporation to operate the bridge. This is not a straightforward operation, and creates some dangers, notably with respect to control, because it is difficult to be sure how the United States courts would interpret the New York act after amendment.

The disadvantages appear to outweigh the advantages of this course of action.

14. A Separate Corporation. A separate corporation to operate the bridge has the following advantages if it is acceptable to the State of New York:

(a) A contractual arrangement can be made with New York which would provide for complete equality of control and for the protection of Canadian interests to the full.

(b) It would be a straightforward, easily defensible arrangement.

(c) It would permit the Canadian Government to prevent the State of New York, or an agency thereof, from imposing tolls at will on the United States portion of the bridge.

(d) It should avoid involving the Canadian Government in paying for the upkeep, operation or replacement of the bridge and its approaches, in paying for improvements, or in paying for the construction of an additional bridge.

15. The disadvantage is that the promoters of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority may find such a plan unacceptable. They have already suggested that it will not suit them, because it would not allow the Port Authority to use the United States half of the bridge as security for bond issues. If the scheme of a separate corporation is acceptable, it should be possible to use the present Bridge Authority for this purpose after suitable changes in composition and terms of reference to give complete protection to Canadian interests.

16. Separate Ownership and Management. It would be possible to suggest that the New York interests take steps to have the existing Bridge Authority pay off its outstanding debts as soon as possible, thereby precipitating the reversion of the two interests in the bridge to Canada and New York respectively. The Canadian Government and such agency as the State of New York might designate could then levy tolls for profit. Each owner would be responsible for maintenance of its own share and for providing for the future. The advantages of this course are:

(a) There would be no untidy responsibilities left over from previous régimes. There would be no doubt as to ownership or control.

(b) From the United States point of view the principal advantage is that the Niagara Frontier Port Authority or other beneficiary would have absolute title to the United States share of the bridge, could mortgage it and its revenues for the maximum amount of capital for use in connection with the port, and would not be hampered by any undertakings to Canada with respect to the size of its obligations or the level of tolls it could charge.

17. The disadvantages are:

(a) This course might give rise to considerable friction. Ad hoc agreements would be required on matters like maintenance and repairs and rates of tolls and methods of collecting tolls.

(b) Toll rates could become a source of dispute, with one side wanting to charge more than the other.

Recommendations

18. The undersigned recommend that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to inform the United States authorities as follows:

(a) The Canadian Government is not prepared to appoint representatives on the Niagara Frontier Port Authority nor to appoint this Authority as the "agency or instrumentality" of the Canadian Government to manage and operate the Canadian portion of the Peace Bridge;

(b) If other suitable arrangements can be made, the Canadian Government is prepared, subject to approval by Parliament, to co-operate with the State of New York (or the Port Authority as its designated agency) in operating the Peace Bridge as a profit-making toll bridge for a substantial but limited period (say 30 years);

(c) Suitable arrangements could be on the lines of a separate corporation, distinct from the Port Authority, in which Canada and the State of New York would participate and have equal rights. Alternatively, the arrangements could take the form of the Canadian Government and the Port Authority respectively owning and operating the respective portions of the bridge for profit, and of course making working agreements for practical co-operation.

(d) The Canadian Government is prepared, subject to approval by Parliament, to co-operate with the State of New York for the purposes of liquidating the present Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority, including payment of the outstanding bonded indebtedness out of accumulated surpluses, and of vesting the U.S. portion of the bridge in the Niagara Frontier Port Authority as the designated agency of the State of New York.

19. The undersigned also recommend that, if arrangements can be made with the United States authorities within a reasonable time pursuant to the principles laid down in paragraph 18, they be authorized to submit a further report to Cabinet with a view to Cabinet approving the introduction of the necessary legislation during the 1956 Session of Parliament.[190]

PEACE BRIDGE: AMENDMENT OF NEW YORK STATE ACT

As Mr. Wershof informed you yesterday, the United States Embassy has sent us the text of the amendments to the New York State Act of 1955, creating the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. These amendments have apparently been introduced already into the New York State Legislature, in order to meet a March 7 deadline for the introduction of amendments. The amendments provide that the existing Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority should be dissolved, and that the two halves of the bridge should revert to New York State and to Canada. The New York State half of the bridge would go under the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. This is one of the alternative arrangements offered by Canada in the memorandum of February 3, 1956. Our memorandum provided, however, that the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the old Authority should be paid off before it was terminated, whereas the draft amendments provide for the assumption of this bonded indebtedness by the successor bodies. Study of the amendments may indicate other respects in which they fail to meet our requirements.

2. In passing us the text of the amendments, the Embassy informed us that State Senator Mahoney, Majority Leader of the New York State Senate, had been requested to introduce the amendments. Senator Mahoney has also been requested to consult the Canadian authorities. Up to now, however, the Embassy has simply passed us the amendments and has made no requests for consultations.

3. In accordance with your instructions, Mr. Wershof explained our attitude to Mr. Rewinkel of the Embassy today. He pointed out that the Embassy had already been informed of the view of the Canadian Government that it would be desirable to have consultations between Canadian authorities and the appropriate authorities either of New York State or of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, concerning any new arrangement for the Peace Bridge which is intended to meet the views of the Canadian Government, set out in the memorandum of February 3, 1956. These consultations would cover particularly the text of any amendments to Chapter 870 which are intended to meet the Canadian requirements. The Canadian Government could not, however, conduct such consultations in the space of a few days, as various Departments of the Government are concerned, and it would probably also be necessary to consult local representatives from the area. It seemed that the New York State Legislature may conclude its current session by about March 15. If this were the target date, the intervening period would not permit the type of consultation which the Canadian Government wished, and there would be little purpose in a visit to Ottawa of representatives of New York State or of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority.

4. Mr. Wershof went on to say that it was, of course, recognized that the New York State Legislature could pass whatever amendments it wished to Chapter 870, and that some of the proposed amendments were required for other reasons than to meet Canadian wishes. Nevertheless, as time did not apparently permit adequate consultation, it was desirable to make clear that the Canadian Government would not be able to express any views on the proposed amendments before March 15. In order to avoid misunderstanding on this point, he suggested that the appropriate New York State authorities be informed as soon as possible of the attitude of the Canadian Government.

5. In speaking with Mr. Rewinkel of the Embassy, Mr. Wershof referred to March 15 as the likely date for the conclusion of the current session of the New York Legislature, as this was the date given us by the Embassy. The Consulate General in New York has, however, informed us that the legislature may sit until March 22 and possibly later. If the session lasts until March 22 or later, it may be possible for the Government to reach a decision as to whether or not the proposed amendments are acceptable before the conclusion of the session, that is, before they are adopted by the legislature. We will study the amendments in conjunction with the Department of Finance, and will send you a further memorandum as soon as a preliminary opinion has been reached on this point at the official level.

PEACE BRIDGE

The most recent development regarding the Peace Bridge, which Mr. Wershof discussed with you yesterday by telephone, is that Mr. Harris has agreed to receive Mr. William Connelly, Chairman of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, next Monday at 3:30. The appointment was arranged, at Connelly's request, by Mr. Houck, M.P., and subsequently Mr. Houck advised Mr. Connelly that although he understood Mr. Harris would see him, it would be preferable if an official request were made through the United States Embassy in Ottawa.

2. As you know, we had received an informal request from the Embassy last week to receive Judge Gutman, counsel to Governor Harriman, to discuss the bridge legislation. With your concurrence, we discouraged this request, and our message was passed to Albany by the Embassy. We have now learned that, in his reply to the Embassy, Judge Gutman stated that as the new bill will likely pass both Houses before the legislature adjourns (the adjournment may take place today), he proposes not to come to Ottawa until after the Governor has decided whether or not to sign it (there is apparently a 30-day period in which he must make this decision). The Embassy is, however, informing Judge Gutman of Mr. Connelly's proposed visit, in case he wishes to be received by Mr. Harris at the same time.

3. At the meeting Mr. Wershof had yesterday with Mr. Deutsch of the Department of Finance, it was decided that the detailed information about the Peace Bridge which is available to officials is insufficient for them to be able to make recommendations to Ministers regarding the acceptability of the legislation now before the New York State Legislature.

4. It was further decided to recommend to Ministers that we should make an effort to obtain a clearer picture of the action which is considered necessary or desirable by the officials and people of Fort Erie. It was the view of the meeting that a representative of Fort Erie interests should be present at any meeting we have with United States officials, and we expect that the Department of Finance will recommend to Mr. Harris that such a representative attend his meeting with Mr. Connelly. There are two likely candidates for this job: Mr. Houck or a person nominated by the Town Council of Fort Erie. Presumably Mr. Harris will decide between these or decide to invite both.

5. It may be that Monday's meeting will provide more information on the needs and wishes of the people of the area, but it may still be advisable to have a team consisting of representatives from the Departments of External Affairs and Finance (possibly Messrs. Wershof and Deutsch) visit the town of Fort Erie at a convenient time within the next three or four weeks, to sound out local opinion.[191] As it would also be useful to have an on-the-spot report as to the appropriateness of the present Bridge Authority's rather substantial long-term program of capital improvements (which we believe to be a major factor affecting the attitude of local interested parties), it might be advisable to have a qualified engineer from the Department of Public Works accompany these officials.

6. I should be grateful to have your views on this suggestion that a small interdepartmental group of officials should visit the Fort Erie area in the near future, if this appears desirable after the meeting on Monday.

PEACE BRIDGE

On March 23, the New York State Senate passed a bill to amend the Niagara Frontier Port Authority Act of 1955. The text was that which we have been studying in conjunction with the Department of Finance, except that the section dealing with the Peace Bridge was deleted and replaced by a clause which expressly removed the Peace Bridge from the operational sphere of the Port Authority and returned it to the present Bridge Authority. The Legislature passed a second bill which established a temporary nine-man state commission to seek information on the future operation of the Peace Bridge, have conferences with the Canadian Government and report back to the next regular session of the State Legislature. We have been informed by Port Authority officials that it is expected Governor Harriman will veto both of these bills because they would make the Port Authority economically unsound. The passage of these bills by the legislature, however, disturbs the basis on which we have been dealing with officials of the Port Authority regarding the Peace Bridge, as it appears that the New York State Legislature is not now convinced that responsibility for the United States half of the bridge should be vested in the Port Authority. On the other hand, if we were now to tell New York State that we would prefer to deal with it on the subject instead of with the Port Authority, we would likely be informed by the Governor (who is the only government official with whom we should deal) that his veto of the new legislation makes the situation revert to its position when the 1955 Act was passed, that the 1955 Act provided for the reversionary interest in the bridge to be vested in the Port Authority and that we should therefore deal with that organization.

2. Mr. Harris received a delegation last Monday from the Port Authority and the City of Buffalo. The Mayor of Fort Erie and Mr. Houck were present. Wershof attended the meeting and was able to obtain a slightly clearer view of the plans the U.S. officials had when they drafted the now-amended legislation. Mr. Harris agreed that, subject to your concurrence and to prior consultation with local interests in Fort Erie, we should begin negotiations with officials of the Port Authority (acting through the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa) towards the framing of a draft agreement for the future operation of the bridge, which might be signed by the Canadian Government and the Port Authority if and when the State Legislature and the United States Congress pass the necessary legislation. Although, as outlined above, the right of the Port Authority to negotiate with the Canadian Government is temporarily uncertain, I recommend that you concur in the course of action agreed to by Mr. Harris.[192]

3. Regarding the suggestion Wershof had made concerning a visit by a small interdepartmental group to Fort Erie to assess local opinion and requirements, I think, in view of the above developments, that this is even more important now than previously.[193] You suggested that Mr. Harris might ask his Parliamentary Assistant, Mr. Benidickson, to undertake this fact-finding tour, accompanied by officials of External Affairs, Finance and perhaps Public Works. We have asked Mr. Deutsch to pass this suggestion on to Mr. Harris. (Enclosed is a copy of Wershof's letter† to Deutsch).

PEACE BRIDGE: MEETING OF MR. HARRIS WITH PORT AUTHORITY OFFICIALS

Hon. Walter Harris, assisted by Mr. W.L. Houck, M.P., and officials of the Departments of Finance and External Affairs, received several United States officials on March 26 at 3:30, and a discussion was held on the future of the Peace Bridge. Present for United States interests were Messrs. Connelly, Naples and Neider for the Niagara Frontier Port Authority; Mr. Lawless of the City of Buffalo; and Messrs. Rewinkel and Dubs of the U.S. Embassy. Also present was Mayor W.T. Guess of Fort Erie, Ontario.

2. Mr. Houck opened by explaining that the meeting had been arranged in order that Canadian and U.S. officials might exchange views on the future of the Peace Bridge prior to beginning more detailed negotiations. Mr. Connelly made a brief statement of the position of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, stating that the Authority's interest was to obtain title to the U.S. portion of the bridge and that they wished to reach some agreement with the Canadian Government that would make this possible.

3. At Mr. Harris's request, Mr. Wershof reviewed recent developments from the Canadian point of view, and then asked whether the amending bill, which had been given to Canadian officials recently, had been passed by the New York State Senate. Mr. Lawless stated that that bill had been lost in the Senate late Friday, March 23, although it had previously been passed by the Assembly. Senator Mahoney had, however, substituted two other bills on the subject, which had passed both Assembly and Senate that day. The first of these bills established a nine-man commission of the Legislature to study the future of the Peace Bridge, to negotiate with the Canadian authorities on the subject and to report back to the Legislature by February 1, 1957. The second removed all reference to the Peace Bridge from the N.F.P.A. Act of 1955. Mr. Lawless expressed confidence that the Governor of New York would veto both these bills.

4. Mr. Lawless then reviewed the situation from the U.S. point of view, stressing that when the Niagara Frontier Port Authority was created, it was decided that a substantial revenue-producing utility must be included in its operational sphere to make the project economically sound. The Peace Bridge was ideal for this purpose, and they had forthwith legislated the bridge into the Authority's purview, on the assumption that the Canadian Government would be interested in the arrangement. They had learned in February last that this was an erroneous assumption, and as a result, N.F.P.A., Buffalo and State Legislature officials had drafted "open-end" amendments to the 1955 legislation which could serve as a basis for working out an arrangement with the Canadian authorities. In answer to Mr. Wershof's query, Mr. Lawless explained that the U.S. officials had been thinking in terms of the second alternative suggestion set out in the aide-mémoire of February 3, i.e. dividing the bridge between the N.F.P.A. and the Canadian Government or its designated agency and making working arrangements for the operation of the bridge. (At this point Mr. Lawless explained the awkward situation the City of Buffalo found itself in as a result of the failure of the amending bill, as it was committed under the 1955 Act to transfer civic assets valued at about $12 million to the N.F.P.A., an organization which would not be economically sound without the Peace Bridge.)

[193] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

5. Further to the question of what the U.S. officials had envisaged when they drafted the now-defeated amendments, Mr. Connelly explained they had expected that the Bridge Authority's bonds would be paid off out of accumulated surpluses and revenue before the assets were divided between the successor agencies. With regard to the projected capital improvements on the Canadian side, which were of particular interest to the town of Fort Erie, he stated that if the bonds were paid off, it would be for the successor authority on each side to decide whether to make additional capital improvements. He had no comment on the suggestion that the Bridge Authority had recently expended considerable funds on improving the U.S. side, and was only now beginning similar improvements on the Canadian side. Mr. Lawless stated, however, that the Port Authority into which, by the legislation, the present Bridge Authority would be merged, would assume any legal or moral obligation incurred by the Bridge Authority in this regard. He stated there were precedents in the United States for this operation — the merging of two authorities into one which would continue the functions of both.

6. Regarding the tax payments made by the present Bridge Authority to the town of Fort Erie, Mr. Lawless reviewed the history of the tax problem of the bridge, pointing out that although the Bridge Authority had paid about $500,000 to Fort Erie since 1933, the City of Buffalo had received no tax revenue whatever, because of a restrictive clause in the 1933 New York Legislation which created the Peace Bridge Authority. He stated that the new New York legislation would allow the bridge to pay taxes to both communities. If a tax payment were made from the bridge revenues to Fort Erie before division of profits, a similar amount should be paid to Buffalo.

7. Mr. Lawless explained that it had been decided to couch the New York legislation in general terms, rather than to legislate on specific points, because this would provide a more satisfactory basis on which to negotiate. It had been arranged that if the New York amending bill had been passed, a bill would be introduced into Congress by Senator Lehman to grant authority to the State of New York or its agent to negotiate with the Canadian Government regarding the future of the Peace Bridge. He cited a precedent, a sewer authority in Manitoba and one of its neighbour states, in which Congress had, because of the importance of the local interest, delegated to a state its right to negotiate with a foreign government.

8. Mr. Wershof asked whether, assuming the Canadian Government did come to some agreement with the N.F.P.A., it would be necessary to wait for the next session of the State Legislature before appropriate legislation might be passed. Mr. Lawless expressed confidence that a Special Session of the Legislature would be called this summer to deal with other matters. This might occur in June.

9. Mr. Wershof asked the Mayor of Fort Erie whether he wished to make a statement, but Mr. Guess declined, stating that his Council stood behind the brief which had been submitted to the Canadian Government on February 14, and in the absence of his counsel, he would prefer to listen rather than speak.

10. In closing the meeting, Mr. Harris stated that, subject to the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he saw no reason to object to the initiation of negotiations with the N.F.P.A. of an agreement which might be signed if and when the New York State Legislature and the U.S. Congress passed the required legislation, provided such negotiation did not imply a firm commitment at this time to a particular course of action. He also referred to the necessity of knowing the wishes of Fort Erie and area, and indicated to Mr. Houck and Mr. Guess that these would be given every consideration.

PEACE BRIDGE

On April 3, you approved my recommendation that you concur in the arrangement Mr. Harris recently made with representatives of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority and the City of Buffalo regarding the Peace Bridge. We will now inform the Department of Finance of your concurrence.

2. Additional information has, however, come to hand since Mr. Harris's meeting with the United States officials which, I believe, makes it advisable for us to add certain conditions to this expression of concurrence. It appears from newspaper reports that the legislation proposed by the N.F.P.A. was defeated by the Republican majority in the State Senate on straight party lines. The N.F.P.A. (who we assume to be Democratically inclined) has, in obtaining from Mr. Harris an undertaking to start negotiations, secured a valuable argument with which to convince the Democratic Governor (Mr. Harriman) to veto the bills which were passed by the Republican-dominated legislature, and which removed the U.S. end of the Peace Bridge from the purview of the Port Authority. The action of the State Senate was a blow to the N.F.P.A., and they are now fighting hard to retain responsibility for the U.S. end of the Peace Bridge, because without it the N.F.P.A. is not a viable project. They may well use the undertaking of Mr. Harris in arguing with their opponents that they are best fitted to look after the interests of New York State in the Peace Bridge. Thus the Canadian Government may be involved in this party dispute. This would be particularly unfortunate as the Republican leaders have insisted on proper consultations with Canada, before confirming the N.F.P.A. as the New York State agent for the Peace Bridge. Moreover, one representative Canadian local body, the Fort Erie Town Council, is strongly opposed to control of the U.S. end of the bridge by the N.F.P.A.

3. It would be difficult now to alter the arrangement made by Mr. Harris, even if his consent were forthcoming. However, to protect the Canadian position in future, I think we should attempt to reach an understanding with the Department of Finance, that we have no particular preference for negotiating with the N.F.P.A., but will deal with whatever representatives of the State of New York are presented to us by the United States Embassy in Ottawa.

4. I should be grateful for your approval of this line of action.[195]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 24, 1956

REPORT ON VISIT OF OFFICIALS TO PEACE BRIDGE AT FORT ERIE[196]

This document has no official status. The following are the undersigned's impressions of the events and results of the visit to Fort Erie of a group led by Mr. W.M. Benidickson, Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance, and including Mr. W.L. Houck, M.P. for Niagara Falls, and representatives of the Departments of Finance, Public Works, External Affairs and National Revenue (the local Collector of Customs) on Thursday and Friday, July 19 and 20. The purpose of the visit was to sound out local opinion regarding possible changes in the administration of the Peace Bridge, which had been proposed by certain United States authorities.

2. On arrival in Fort Erie the group was met by members of the existing Bridge Authority and was escorted immediately to the Administration Buildings at the Canadian end of the bridge. After a detailed tour of the installations at both terminals, the group had luncheon and a conference with the Bridge Authority. In the evening a meeting was held with certain members of the Fort Erie Town Council and the Town Solicitor, and on Friday morning in the Council Chamber the group heard representations from other interested organizations and individuals, including the Fort Erie Chamber of Commerce, the Warden of Welland County, the Federation of Bertie Township Property Owners' Associations, the Fort Erie Rotary Club, the Ontario Trucking Association, the Association of International Border Agencies and local customs brokers. This was followed by luncheon with the Town Council, and the group departed in mid-afternoon.

3. There was marked unanimity in the opinions expressed by the various agencies making representations to the group. All were quick to endorse the work of the existing Bridge Authority and to recommend its continuance until the end of its term in 1962. When comments were made on the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, these were decidedly adverse, it being considered that the Port Authority would not maintain the efficiency of the bridge operation but instead would raise tolls and use Peace Bridge revenues for other unrelated purposes.

4. As expressed by Mr. Benidickson and Mr. Houck at the beginning of each of the sessions in Fort Erie, the purpose of the visit was to listen and obtain information. The only statement which was made (and made to each of the interested groups) was that any arrangement which would change the administration of the bridge would require Canadian legislation and it would not be possible for such legislation to be introduced at this session of Parliament. As a result of this assurance given by the leader of the group, the chairman of the existing Bridge Authority indicated the Authority would begin construction of the Fort Erie marshalling yard this season. This was one part of the 1956 construction program which had been suspended since early in the year.

Existing Bridge Authority

5. It was apparent to the group that the existing Peace Bridge Authority is doing a commendable job administering the bridge. The members of the Authority appear to gain nothing from the efforts they make in this respect except the satisfaction of public service. The management of the bridge is, I think, competent and devoted to its task. Its primary aim now is to complete the program of improvements which will enable the bridge to give more satisfactory service to its users. In particular, there is a need for better truck-handling at the Canadian end, as well as greater flexibility in dealing with auto traffic which is heavier in either direction at certain times of day.

6. The Bridge Authority expressed great concern over the indefiniteness of its status following the passage of the Port Authority legislation. The position of the Bridge Authority is set out in the attached memorandum† which was prepared by Mr. Van Allen, General Counsel, and in the diagram† of the plaza at the Canadian end of the bridge, also attached. The only correction I would suggest would be in paragraphs 17 and 18, to the statement that excess revenues until January 1, 1962 would be required for the improvement program. As originally set out, the program called for an annual expenditure until 1959. When I discussed this point with the general manager, he mentioned the loss of most of this year's construction season and suggested also that traffic increases since the inception of the program would necessitate further improvements. He agreed, however, that the program if undisturbed would likely be completed in 1959 or 1960 at the latest.

7. The position of the present Authority is precarious. It was ignored and bypassed by the State Government[197] when the new Port Authority was established. If for some reason the Port Authority cannot gain control over the Peace Bridge, the Governor can still frustrate the operations of the existing Authority and eventually control them. One U.S. member died in February, 1956; the term of another has run out (the Attorney-General has ruled that he continues to sit until his successor is appointed), and the term of another will end early in 1957. By appointing his own men, as he has the power to do, the Governor can in a few years' time, control the bridge. He has presumably not done this, because by making appointments to this body he would seem to agree to its continuing in its present function. This course is, however, open to him if his intentions regarding the Port Authority are frustrated by the Canadian Government.

8. I spoke informally to the General Manager of the Bridge Authority about what he envisaged would happen, disregarding for the moment the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, after the Bridge Authority surrendered its trust in 1962. He told me he understood the idea had been to form a new entity with equal representation which would supervise the administration of the bridge. He thought that auto and bus tolls could be eliminated entirely, with a reduced truck toll carrying all the administration and depreciation costs.

9. One important point which is illustrated by this thought about future operations is the conviction held by the present management, and vigorously supported by the collector of Customs, that the bridge cannot be operated efficiently by two entities. Apparently until 12 years ago there were two supervisors acting under the General Manager, each controlling the operation at one end of the bridge. This was found unworkable, and the present traffic control for the whole bridge is a centralized operation.

Fort Erie Tax Interests

10. As we knew, one of the chief interests the Town of Fort Erie has in the Peace Bridge is to ensure continuation of its tax revenues. These rise to $60,000 in 1962 by an agreement made some time ago between the Town and the Bridge Authority. Beyond that date the Town now proposes payment in lieu of taxes of 5% of gross revenue with a minimum of $60,000. As the Town also supports the general idea that tolls should be gradually reduced, it would appear it wishes to guarantee the tax-income at $60,000. This is not the place to discuss the merits of this request; it was, however, acknowledged by Town officials that under any new arrangement Buffalo should be eligible to receive an amount equal to that obtained by Fort Erie and that this would be a substantial burden for the Bridge administration to bear with reduced tolls.

Welland River Development Scheme

11. It had been anticipated that some local groups would recommend the use of the Canadian half of the Peace Bridge revenues to improve the Welland River in accordance with the brief presented to Ministers in April. This did not happen, although the representative of the Fort Erie Chamber of Commerce expressed the Chamber's approval of the plan in principle, while objecting to the use of revenues from the Peace Bridge for this purpose. No other mention was made of this scheme.

12. At the Thursday evening meeting the Town Solicitor, Mr. Tyrrill, referred to the bill then before Congress which would authorize New York State to negotiate an agreement with the Canadian Government providing for the establishment of the Port Authority and the transfer of the Peace Bridge to that body. Mr. Tyrrill thought that if this legislation were passed, the hand of the Port Authority would be strengthened vis-à-vis the existing Bridge Authority, and he suggested that representations be made through the State Department to stall action on this bill if possible. Mr. Benidickson did not agree to do this or to recommend such action, but indicated that the matter would be looked into. As the Canadian position is protected in any event, and as we had told the Embassy in Washington to comment, if asked, that the bill had been bypassed by events and was now outmoded, it would be inappropriate for Canada to make the approach which Mr. Tyrrill suggests. I understand he has renewed this suggestion in a letter to Mr. Houck, and think that the situation does not call for representations at this time.[198]

13. In sum, the visit to Fort Erie had several satisfactory results. It confirmed and added to our store of information about the bridge operation and about the opinion the local Canadians had on the subject. It also alleviated somewhat the concern of the Bridge Authority about its operations for the remainder of 1956. The show of interest by the Canadian Government also, I believe, had a beneficial effect on the local Canadians who gain most of their information about this subject from Buffalo sources and are therefore subject to the strong public relations efforts of the new Port Authority.

Dear Mr. Dubs,

I should like to refer to my letter of November 1,† which acknowledged yours of October 26† regarding the proposed resumption of discussions on the Peace Bridge.

Canadian officials have given further thought to this problem and have reached certain conclusions which are summarized in the attached memorandum. You may wish to pass copies of this paper to the officials of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority and the State of New York who are interested in this problem. I imagine they will wish to study the Canadian views in relation to their own plans, and I would therefore suggest that there be a meeting of Canadian and United States officials in Ottawa on Thursday, December 13. I should be grateful to learn from you whether that date would be acceptable to the interested United States authorities.[199]

Memorandum by American Division

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 23, 1956

In a memorandum given to the United States Embassy on February 3, 1956, the Government of Canada indicated with respect to proposals for the future operation and management of the Peace Bridge set out in Chapter 870 of the Laws of the State of New York 1955, that it was "unable to agree to appoint the Niagara Frontier Port Authority as its Agency or Instrumentality to manage and operate the portion of the Peace Bridge and its related facilities situated within the territorial limits of Canada". The Government of Canada did, however, indicate at that time that, notwithstanding its satisfaction with the present arrangement, it was prepared in a spirit of co-operation to enter into other suitable arrangements for a limited number of years.

Since that time much thought has been given to the kind of arrangement which would be in keeping with the international character of the bridge as well as its importance as an economic artery between Canada and the United States. Within the framework of the memorandum of February 3, 1956, Canadian officials have developed a more specific proposal for the future operation of the bridge which, it is believed, will satisfy the legitimate interests of both countries.

The proposal, which it is desired should be discussed at the forthcoming meeting of Canadian and United States officials, is based on the following principles:

(1) The control and management of the bridge should be vested in an international commission composed of equal representation from Canada and the United States with the chairmanship alternating between Canada and the United States from within this membership;

(2) The control and operation of the bridge should be kept separate from any other Canadian or United States interest;

(3) The first charge on all revenues of the bridge must be the normal operating costs, the amount required annually for normal maintenance of the structure and its auxiliary buildings on both approaches, and the annual cost of such capital works as are required from time to time to accommodate the traffic seeking to use the facility.

It is the opinion of Canadian officials that excess or net revenue, after the charges referred to in (3) above have been met, should be divided equally as between the two countries, to be paid to agencies designated by the appropriate legislative bodies.

With regard to the hope expressed by the Embassy that agreement might be reached before the convening of the New York State Legislature in January 1957, Canadian officials consider it unwise at this stage to impose any limit on the time to be taken in considering the various aspects of this question, but will of course pursue the matter as expeditiously as possible.

PEACE BRIDGE

As I informed you in my memorandum of November 28,† we had agreed to meet with officials of the State of New York and the Niagara Frontier Port Authority to discuss the future control and operation of the Peace Bridge. The meeting was held here on December 13 and can, I believe, be considered a successful encounter.

2. The Canadian officials presented, as planned, a proposal for vesting the control of the bridge in a new international entity, with equal Canadian and New York State representation. Although the U.S. representatives were at first reluctant to accept the principle involved, i.e. the separation of control of the bridge from the operations of the Port of Buffalo, they eventually agreed to the establishment of a "Management Board" which would run the bridge. The Canadian group made it clear that there is no Canadian objection to the payment to the Port Authority of the U.S. share of the profits of this independent operation. Significantly, the U.S. officials also agreed that in normal circumstances the tolls on the bridge should not be raised. (Mr. Harris has expressed the view that tolls should not be raised.) With these principles accepted, the two sides agreed to prepare first drafts of legislation, which will be discussed at a further meeting in Albany on January 16.

3. On being informed of the results of the December 13 meeting, Mr. Harris instructed his officials to prepare a memorandum to Cabinet describing the problem briefly and seeking authority for the introduction of the necessary legislation at the forthcoming session of Parliament. A copy of the draft memorandum to Cabinet is attached. I should be grateful for your approval of it.

4. There is another question which is now being considered by Mr. Harris in consultation with Mr. William Houck, M.P., which concerns the possible composition of the Canadian half of the proposed "Management Board". It is in our interest that the U.S. half should not consist entirely of members of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, and if we can give an indication that the Canadian representation will be rather more broadly based, this may have a useful effect on the U.S. side. We have therefore concurred in the Finance Department's recommendation to Mr. Harris that the Board include at least one representative of the Federal interest in Canada, possibly as Chairman of the Canadian side.

5. The question of the form of the arrangement or agreement with New York State is somewhat difficult. It is now under study in the Department, and I hope to send you a further memorandum on it in a day or two.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures et du ministre des Finances pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of Finance to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 6-57 Ottawa, January 7, 1957

PEACE BRIDGE

The undersigned have the honour to report that following the last Cabinet consideration of the future of the abovenoted bridge, an aide mémoire setting out the position of the Government of Canada was communicated to the United States Embassy on February 3, 1956; a group, headed by the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance, visited Fort Erie and secured the views of interested groups as they pertained to the problem and, on December 13, Canadian officials met with officials of the State of New York and the Niagara Frontier Port Authority in Ottawa.

The latter meeting was at the request of the United States, through the Embassy in Ottawa. Prior to the meeting the Embassy was furnished with a memorandum reaffirming the Canadian position and outlining in somewhat greater detail the Canadian viewpoint on the nature of future arrangements for the management and operation of the bridge which would take into account its international character and importance as an economic artery between the two countries.

As a result of this latter meeting and of the previous discussions the United States authorities concerned are now prepared to consider new and separate legislation to provide for the future management and operation of the Peace Bridge on the following terms:

(1) The Bridge to be operated by a board of management which shall have full powers to operate it as an entity separate from any other United States or Canadian interest. The board of management should have much the same powers as the present Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority, which it will succeed.

(2) Canada and the United States to have equal representation (the present Authority has nine members of which three are Canadian).

(3) The Bridge to be operated for profit as a toll bridge, for a substantial but limited period. It was agreed that in normal circumstances the level of tolls should not be raised above that now obtaining.

(4) All normal operating costs, maintenance charges, the annual cost of any capital improvements necessary and/or any reserve for future expansion to be the first charge against all revenues.

(5) The net revenues, after the foregoing charges have been met, to be divided equally between Canada and the United States. The United States portion, in keeping with the intent of their existing legislation, will be paid to the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. The Canadian portion will be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The payees of the respective portions, it was understood, would be matters for domestic decision in each country, as would be the appointees to the membership of the board from each side.

Canadian and United States legislation is required to rescind the legislation which created the existing Authority. The question of whether any additional formal agreement is also required is being examined in the Departments of External Affairs and Justice. It appears undesirable for the Canadian Government to make any agreement with New York State beyond that expressed in reciprocal legislation but it might be advantageous to have the new régime on the Peace Bridge covered by a formal agreement with the United States Government acting on behalf of the State of New York.

The United States side attach considerable importance to the matter of timing as they are anxious to proceed with plans of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, which are dependent on the revenues the latter will obtain from the operation of the Peace Bridge. They are bound by a fairly rigid schedule of the New York State Legislature and must be prepared to introduce a bill in final form by March 1, 1957, if it is to receive approval in 1957. It is considered to be in the Canadian interest to cooperate in so far as it is possible to meet this timing.

The undersigned consider that any arrangement for the future operation and management of the Peace Bridge, embodying the above principles, will be in the Canadian interest. They, accordingly, recommend that Cabinet give approval to the following:

(1) Further discussions with responsible officials in the State of New York on the requirements of mutually acceptable draft legislation and possible agreement.

(2) The drafting of such legislation and possible agreement.

(3) The introduction of legislation, after approval by Cabinet, at the forthcoming session of Parliament.[200]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 8, 1957

PEACE BRIDGE: FORM OF AGREEMENT WITH NEW YORK STATE

I should like to seek your approval for the proposed form for the agreement with New York State on the future régime of the Peace Bridge.

2. The company which built the Peace Bridge between Buffalo and Fort Erie was set up by an act of the New York legislature of 1922, an act of the Canadian Parliament of 1923, and an act of the United States Congress of 1924. The New York State and Canadian acts set up two separate companies with the same name and with the authority to amalgamate, and the amalgamation duly took place and was approved in Canada by an Order-in-Council. The present Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority was established to succeed the original company because of the necessity for a financial reorganization. The Authority was created by a New York State act of 1933, and Canadian legislation of 1934 permitted the Authority to function in Canada and provided for the appointment of three residents of Canada to the board by the Governor General in Council.

3. What we are now seeking to do by negotiation with New York State representatives differs in two respects from what was done in 1933 and 1934 when the Authority was established. The Authority is called a public benefit corporation and the members of the board are appointed by governments, but it is privately financed and the result of private initiative. Hence it is a mixture between a public and a private body. The new management board for the Bridge would be a wholly public body. Secondly, the existing Authority was created by New York State legislation and then Canadian legislation was passed permitting it to function in Canada. Our intention is that the new management board would not come into being until the appropriate legislation had been passed by the New York State legislature, Congress and the Canadian Parliament, and that accordingly the New York legislation, which would be the first to be passed, would not have effect until Parliament and Congress had acted. It is the view of our legal officers that a management board with the powers and functions described in the memorandum to Cabinet which has been submitted to you could be created by reciprocal legislation of this character.

4. Because of the differences described above, the proposed arrangement would be more like an agreement between New York State and Canada than the 1933/34 legislation. Moreover, in recent years there has been a certain amount of difficulty about adherence by Canadian provinces to "compacts" made between American states. The United States Constitution provides that no American state can make a compact for instance with Canada or with a Canadian province, without congressional approval. In the present case a joint resolution of Congress was passed in 1956 consenting to a compact or agreement between the State of New York and Canada providing for the Niagara Frontier Port Authority to take over the Peace Bridge (the arrangement envisaged in the 1955 New York State legislation). It is assumed that if and when the New York State legislature passes an act providing for the creation of a management board for the Bridge, Congress will pass a similar resolution authorizing the new arrangement. The Canadian Government has similarly tended to oppose on constitutional grounds the entry of provinces into compacts with American states. It might be that an agreement between Canada and New York State, expressed merely in concurrent legislation, could be cited as a precedent by a province seeking to enter into a compact with an American state in the future. Accordingly it seems desirable that the agreement between Canada and New York State should be covered by an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States.

5. Such an exchange of notes would also be useful in that it would involve the United States Government to some extent in the new arrangement for the Peace Bridge. We may have difficulties with New York State in the future and it would be advantageous to us in such an event to be able to appeal to the United States Government. This point will be obvious to the State Department and therefore it is unlikely it would agree to an exchange of notes containing much of substance. Nevertheless, an exchange of notes would record the agreement expressed in reciprocal legislation and would at least show that the two Governments had been in agreement on the procedure adopted. It might even be possible to get the general character of the new régime on the Peace Bridge set out in the notes.

6. I accordingly propose that the new régime on the Peace Bridge should be expressed in reciprocal legislation of the New York State legislature (confirmed by a joint resolution of Congress) and the Canadian Parliament, and that we should propose that after the legislation is passed, an exchange of notes take place with the United States Government which would at least indicate agreement between the two Governments on the procedure adopted. If you approve, therefore, our representatives in the discussions with New York State on January 16 will indicate that this is the form of agreement which the Canadian Government would like. I would also propose to inform the United States Embassy now of our views on this matter.[201]

You may recall that at its meeting on January 10 the Cabinet authorized further negotiations with New York State on the future of the Peace Bridge between Buffalo and Fort Erie, Ontario. A copy of the memorandum to Cabinet is attached. A meeting took place in Albany on January 16. A number of New York State officials headed by Judge Gutman, Counsel to the Governor, and representatives of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority of Buffalo, and a representative of the United States State Department took part. Officials of the Departments of Finance, of Public Works, and of this department represented Canada.

2. It was agreed at the outset of the meeting to maintain in being the existing Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority rather than to create a new international authority to run the bridge. Amendments to the New York State legislation of 1933 and the Canadian legislation of 1934, which set up the present Authority, would be drafted. They would provide that the winding up of the Authority and the reversion of the two ends of the Bridge to New York State and Canada respectively should be deferred for about thirty years, and that the character and operations of the Authority would be altered to provide equal representation for Canada and the establishment and distribution of net revenues. This decision makes the task of drafting the amendments much simpler. It is also satisfactory to us as the Authority has functioned well and has a good reputation in Canada.

3. It had previously been agreed by the Canadian Government that the bridge should be operated as a profit-making toll bridge for about thirty years and that the net revenues from the bridge should be paid to New York State and Canada or to payees appointed by them. The New York State representatives at Albany confirmed that their payee would be shown in legislation as the Niagara Frontier Port Authority, and that the NFPA would also be shown as the ultimate legatee of the bridge if, at any time in the future, the two halves of the bridge should revert to Canada and New York State. This legislation would, however, be separate from the amendments to the act setting up the Bridge Authority. The NFPA representatives made clear that they intended to use their expectation of net revenue from the bridge and their position as ultimate legatee for the United States half of the bridge as security for a bond issue for developing the port of Buffalo. One of the principal NFPA spokesman was, in fact, a bond counsel and it was obvious that if the arrangements would satisfy the potential underwriters of the bond issue they would satisfy the NFPA.

4. At earlier meetings it had been agreed that each side should have four members of the reconstituted Authority. The Canadian side said that the Canadian members would be appointed as in the past by the Governor General in Council, and that they would represent in a general way the national, regional, and local interest in the efficient operation of the bridge. Although acknowledging that the manner of appointment of the United States members was a matter which did not formally concern Canada, the Canadian representatives made clear that if the United States members of the Authority were all from the NFPA this would make it more difficult for us to get the legislation through, and would not make for the harmonious operation of the bridge in the future. It was emphasized that there was a possible conflict of interest between the bridge and the port of Buffalo concerning the disposition of bridge revenues. After some discussion, the New York representatives agreed that their members of the reconstituted Bridge Authority should be two New York State officials and two NFPA representatives.

5. The New York representatives were, of course, very anxious to safeguard as far as possible the flow of their share of the net revenue to the NFPA. The meeting, therefore, examined the various factors which could influence the size of the net revenue. The first of these is the amount of the toll. The character of the membership and the requirement that any increase in tolls should be approved by the Canadian Board of Railway Commissioners are effective safeguards against an unreasonable toll increase. The New York side did not dispute the general Canadian contention that if traffic and revenue continued to show the general recent upward trend there would be no case for a toll increase. The NFPA representatives were, however, concerned that as they would only have two out of eight members of the Authority, the Authority might decide to reduce tolls in future contrary to NFPA interests. Such a reduction might even be motivated by hostility to the NFPA. The New York side therefore proposed that the amendments to the legislation should include a proviso that tolls be not reduced if the reduction would make the net revenue less than a certain percentage of the gross revenue. The percentage would be something like 40 or 50%, and the calculation would presumably be made on the figures of the most recent fiscal year. Although such a clause would be unusual, if it could be suitably drafted it would appear reasonable for us to give this guarantee.

6. Operation, maintenance, and repair expenses would, of course, be deducted from gross revenue. In order to protect the net revenue the New York representatives were anxious to limit future expenditures for new facilities, major operations or improvements, and for other capital purposes. It was agreed, however, that the Bridge Authority should have a reserve fund for all such expenditures and for interest on any bonds issued for capital purposes. The reserve fund would be nourished by annual payments of a given percentage of the gross revenue (the percentage between 7% and 15%, to be agreed) and it would have a ceiling. Meanwhile it was agreed that the present expansion programme of the Authority, including project (b) for which contracts have not yet been let, will be completed, but that the Authority would be discouraged from making any new commitments for expansion before it is reconstituted.

7. In recent years the Authority has paid a grant in lieu of local taxes to Fort Erie, but under the New York legislation it is exempt from local taxes in the United States. The New York side pointed out that Buffalo had lost by this arrangement a good deal of tax revenue, and that the Authority should either pay local taxes in both countries or pay none. For a few minutes the discussion wandered into the boulder-strewn ground of municipal assessments of public utilities, a very unfavourable ground to Canada, as it is clear that the Buffalo land owned by the Authority is much more valuable than the Fort Erie land. If it were provided that the Authority pay municipal taxes on both sides there would be a constant argument in future for raising the assessment on the Buffalo side. It was, however, agreed that if the Canadian legislation can be so amended, the Authority will be made exempt from local taxes in Canada, and it would be further provided that any grants in lieu of local taxes would be charges upon the net revenue. Thus the principle of equal division of the net revenue would be maintained, and the Canadian Government would pay Fort Erie a grant like the present one, while the NFPA would look after any Buffalo tax claims. The Department of Finance will see if this arrangement, which protects our interests very well, is feasible.

8. It is the opinion of the Canadian officials who went to Albany that the Canadian Government should join in amending the legislation to give effect to the arrangements outlined above, subject to agreement on the text, as these arrangements are favourable to Canada. The New York representatives at Albany showed an accommodating attitude in agreeing to having a separate authority for the bridge, and on the question of New York appointments to the reconstituted Bridge Authority. The proposals they have made to safeguard the flow of net revenue to the NFPA are reasonable in the light of all the circumstances, and can be so worded as not to be injurious to Canadian interests. The next stage is the preparation of amendments to the legislation on each side, and the exchange of texts. If agreement is reached on the texts, it should be possible to get the legislation passed in the current sessions of Parliament and of the New York State Legislature, as envisaged in the Cabinet decision of January 10.[202]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 11, 1957

PEACE BRIDGE

In a memorandum of January 22, of which a copy is attached, I reported on the discussions in Albany on January 16 about the future of the Peace Bridge. Since then we have received from the New York State representatives a draft of amendments to the New York State legislation providing for modifications in the present régime of the Bridge.

2. The following are the chief amendments contained in the draft revision of the New York State legislation which are acceptable to Canada.

(a) The existing Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority is to continue until 1990. (Requested by the United States — agreed).

(b) Instead of six American and three Canadian members as at present, the Authority is to have five from each country. Of the American members a minimum of one and a maximum of three are to be representatives of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority. (Canada requested equal representation and also requested that United States members would not be drawn solely from the N.F.P.A. — agreed).

(c) The Bridge is to continue to produce revenue for non-bridge purposes until 1990. (Requested by the United States but limited in time by Canada — agreed).

(d) Net revenue is to be divided equally. (Requested by Canada — agreed).

(e) Net revenue to be a guaranteed amount. (Requested by the United States — agreed).

(f) A reserve to be set aside for future capital expenditure. (Requested by Canada — agreed).

(g) Bridge Authority to retain authority to issue bonds. (United States request — agreed). Finance have assured us that the Canadian Government has veto on issue of new bonds under Section 15 of the legislation.

(h) The equivalent of the amount paid to Fort Erie in lieu of taxes to be paid to the city of Buffalo. (Requested by the United States — agreed).

3. There were some unacceptable features in the proposed amendments which were not part of any verbal agreements reached at Albany, New York on January 16, 1957. The following represents the main conditions which were not acceptable to Canada and the alternative proposals made by the Department of Finance.

(a) That one half the membership of the Board should constitute a quorum and a majority in certain circumstances. Our proposal is that a simple majority of the Board shall constitute a quorum and a majority for the conduct of any business.

(b) That if an application for an increase in rates is made by the Board and refused by the competent authorities in either country, the loss in profit would be made up by that country e.g., if the Canadian Board of Transport Commissioners refused an application of the Bridge Authority to increase rates, then the United States share of guaranteed profit would be brought up to the basic level by a payment from the Canadian share. Such an arrangement would, we believe, seriously prejudice the position of the Board of Transport Commissioners.

(c) That the guaranteed basic net revenue should be a specified percentage. Basing our figures on the net revenues of the past six years, we have suggested an annual amount of $400,000. This provides $200,000 each to Canada and the United States to which, of course, would be added any further amount not required for the capital reserve or operating funds. It was the view of the Department of Finance that the amount chosen should satisfy the requirements of the Niagara Frontier Port Authority but be at such a level that the Bridge Authority would not be compelled to make an application for toll increases within the next few years.

(d) That there should be a mandatory increase in tolls subject to the approval of the appropriate authority in each country when the net revenue falls below the guaranteed amount. An alternative suggestion by Canada is that the Bridge Authority should apply to the appropriate authorities for an adjustment of tolls when necessary.

4. The foregoing proposed amendments which are chiefly connected with financial arrangements have, I am informed, received the concurrence of the Minister of Finance and were subsequently discussed with this Department before being forwarded to the New York officials.

5. The New York State amendments were received late and consequently it may be difficult for the legislation to be passed by the New York State Legislature and by the Canadian Parliament at the current session. The officials of the Department of Finance are of the opinion that it still might be possible to get our legislation passed at the current session by providing for one or two amendments to the present Canadian Act with a reference to the amendments in the New York State Act contained in the preamble or by annexing the New York State Act to the Canadian Bill.

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], May 16, 1957

Mr. Cleveland:

PEACE BRIDGE

As you know, the appropriate legislation on the Peace Bridge has been passed by the State of New York and that reciprocal legislation is now before the Canadian Parliament. We know that the Canadian legislation has passed the Senate and that it was introduced for first reading in the House of Commons just prior to dissolution. It is expected that the House of Commons will act upon this legislation at the next session which may possibly be this autumn. Having regard to the need to bringing this matter on to the appropriate Government level it would seem advisable to have an exchange of notes between Canada and the U.S. instead of a loose agreement between the State of New York and the Government of Canada. I brought this to the attention of our Treaty Section and suggested that when the New York legislation was passed, a copy of the Act might be transmitted by the State Department for onward transmission to us under a formal note. The U.S. note could then request that we forward to them a note enclosing our own legislation on the Peace Bridge when it has received the approval of Parliament. Treaty Section in reply stated that there would be no legal objection to the course suggested. It was suggested, however, that for the notes to become an agreement the terms of the legislation would have to be accepted. I presume that Treaty Section means that the notes should be more than just a reference to the legislation but should state that each country accepts the provisions. This is something I think that might be worked out if the State Department is agreeable to the general principle.

You will recall that this suggestion was taken up with Mr. George Vest when he was here in Ottawa for the diplomatic talks on waters crossing the boundary and that he agreed that this exchange of notes might be useful. In these circumstances if you have an opportunity you might ask the State Department officials when you are in Washington next week if they would wish to initiate the exchange by sending us the New York legislation under a formal note.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 71-56 Ottawa, March 16, 1956

ST. CLAIR RIVER — PROPOSED CUT-OFF CHANNEL

The United States Embassy, in Note No. 235 of May 19, 1955, requested the views of the Canadian Government on a proposal submitted by the United States Army Corps of Engineers for improving the St. Clair River Channel. This is part of a larger programme for the widening and deepening of all the Great Lakes connecting channels by the Government of the United States. The improvement of the St. Clair Channel might be accomplished in one of two ways: (a) widening and deepening the existing channel at Southeast Bend or (b) constructing a cut-off channel through the marshy area on the Canadian side of the St. Clair River. It is considered by the United States Government that one of the two mentioned alternatives is essential to the growing needs of navigation and commerce. Recommendations have been made to the United States Congress by the United States Army Corps of Engineers in support of a new cut-off channel. Whether this alternative will be acceptable to the United States Government depends upon consideration of the economic advantages to be gained, and the conditions which the Canadian Government will impose for the granting of permission to construct the cut through Canadian territory.

2. An interdepartmental committee has given consideration to the plans outlined in the United States Embassy Note and is of the opinion that it is in Canada's interests to have the channel improved. Since the proposed cut-off channel would eliminate the sharp reverse curve which is combined with a relatively narrow channel for two-way traffic through the bend, it is believed that this project would be preferable to widening and deepening the existing channel. For this reason, and because the new channel would be almost entirely in Canadian territory (as opposed to previous dredging which straddled the International Boundary) and therefore involve conditions for which there is no precedent, it is proposed that the Canadian reply to the United States Embassy Note should concern itself specifically with this one project. Should the Canadian conditions be unacceptable to the Government of the United States, or should the project for a cut-off channel be considered uneconomic for other reasons and therefore abandoned, then consideration could be given by the Canadian Government, if requested, to the widening and deepening of the existing channel.

3. In the past, though conditions are not the same now, the United States Government has traditionally assumed responsibility for the cost of improving the Upper Great Lakes connecting channels. Accordingly, in 1955, Congress was asked to authorize the entire programme of Great Lakes channel improvements, of which the St. Clair River project is a part. The bill was passed by the House of Representatives August 1, 1955, but did not receive the approval of the Senate until March 9, 1956. The bill has now been submitted for the approval of the President.

4. The United States Army Corps of Engineers estimates that the construction of the new cut would cost approximately $5,491,000 more than widening and deepening the existing channel. The annual cost of dredging maintenance would be approximately $40,000. The principal local interests in Canada which would be affected by the construction of the new channel are the Indians of the Walpole Island reservation and the St. Clair Shooting Club, which has acquired a lease from the Indians in this area for duck shooting. The cost of compensation to the local interests in Canada would probably not exceed $200,000, since this figure has been mentioned by the Walpole Island Indian Band Council as the amount the Indians should receive. In addition, some disturbances may be created to the migratory birds which have historically used this area for breeding and feeding grounds and to certain species of fish which are to be found in these waters.

5. As the new cut would be almost entirely in Canadian territory, various alternative arrangements might be made with the United States:

(a) The Canadian Government could construct the new cut and pay the entire cost of the project, or,

(b) while retaining sovereignty over the territory, the Canadian Government could authorize the United States Government to construct the cut, maintain it and pay compensation to any local interests affected, or,

(c) while retaining sovereignty over the territory, the Canadian Government could authorize the United States Government to construct the cut, with Canada assuming responsibility for the payment of compensation to local interests in Canada, and for maintenance of the channel.

The Canadian Government might request, particularly under arrangement (c), that Canadian contractors be given an equal opportunity to bid on all or part of the project and that Canadian labour might, where practicable, be employed.

6. In reaching a decision on which alternative arrangement would be most appropriate, the following considerations might be taken into account:

(a) The United States has traditionally assumed responsibility for any improvements in the Upper Great Lakes connecting channels. Canada, for its part, built, maintains and operates the Welland Canal and has undertaken the dredging of the St. Lawrence River below Montreal. Accordingly, it would not appear to be necessary for Canada to assume heavy capital expenditures in the Upper Great Lakes connecting channels;

(b) Experience with United States defence projects in Canada shows that difficulties arise when the United States Government constructs works on Canadian territory;

(c) It is not desirable that the United States should acquire, or even appear to acquire, proprietary rights on Canadian territory as a result of the constructions, maintenance or operation of a project of this nature;

(d) Since the proposed channel would be almost entirely in Canadian territory, opportunity should be given to Canadian contractors to bid on the project and to Canadian workmen to obtain employment. This is the arrangement in effect for defence projects which the United States has desired to be constructed in Canada;

(e) If the United States Government constructs the channel, appropriate conditions should be laid down to protect Canadian interests, both private and public.

7. If our reply to the United States Embassy is based on the arrangement set out in paragraph 5(c), authorizing the United States Government to construct this channel in Canadian territory, the following basic conditions might be included in the Canadian reply to the United States Embassy Note No. 235:

(a) That the final plans for the construction of the channel, including plans for spoil disposal areas and such revetment works as may be necessary to ensure reasonable permanence of the banks of the channel, shall be approved by the Canadian Government;

(b) That dredging and excavations and the deposit of dredged and excavated materials shall not be carried out on Canadian territory until such time as the Canadian Government has made arrangements for the entry of personnel and equipment;

(c) That the United States shall accept the responsibility for safeguarding the interests of navigation and riparian owners during the progress of the work, and the cost of remedial works and compensation if the interests of navigation or riparian owners are affected during the construction of the channel;

(d) That the works to be carried out in Canadian territory shall be without prejudice to the sovereign rights of Canada;

(e) That Canadian contractors shall be given an equal opportunity with United States contractors to bid on all or part of the work and that Canadian workers shall be given employment in so far as those of necessary qualifications are available;

(f) That the appropriate customs procedures to be followed concerning dredging equipment and consumable items will be drawn up when the general conditions of contracting and employment have been agreed upon by the Governments of Canada and the United States.

Recommendation:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, recommends:

(a) That the United States Government be authorized to construct the proposed cut-off channel in Canadian territory under the conditions set out above;

(b) That Canada should pay for compensation to local interests in Canada and assume responsibility for maintenance and administration of the channel.

ST. CLAIR RIVER; PROPOSED CUT-OFF CHANNEL

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to his earlier memorandum on the proposed cut-off channel for improving the St. Clair River, and said he had spoken to the Prime Minister about it recently over the telephone. Mr. St. Laurent wished to look more closely at the proposal before a decision was taken on it.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 16, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 71-56).

14. During the course of discussion it was indicated:

(a) There was a tacit understanding with the United States that, just as Canada created and maintained the Welland Canal and the channels in the St. Lawrence, the U.S. constructed and maintained the channels in the upper Great Lakes. On this basis, the proposed cut-off might perhaps be built by Canada at the cost of the U.S. On the other hand, it was unlikely that the U.S. government could get approval from Congress for such action and, in any case, it was doubtful if Canada had the proper equipment available. The normal pattern should be followed by which Canada retained title to the property even though the U.S. did the actual excavation work.

(b) It might be an undesirable precedent for Canada to do this work, as the U.S. might then expect the Canadian government to undertake all dredging on the Canadian side of the international boundary. This could develop into a large and very expensive operation.

(c) The U.S. might not wish to undertake construction of the proposed cut-off, because it preferred to have the channel more convenient to the American shore.

(d) It would be desirable to check on all the costs of the proposal, including construction. The cost of compensation to the local interests involved, principally Indians of the Walpole Island reservation, would be in the neighbourhood of $200,000. The Indian band had already approved that figure. Expropriation, if needed, would be justified at such a price. There did not appear to be any problem about immigration regulations.

15. The Cabinet noted the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and deferred decision on the proposed St. Clair River cut-off until the Prime Minister was present.

ST. CLAIR RIVER; PROPOSED CUT-OFF CHANNEL
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 22)

25. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that one of the basic conditions governing improvement of the St. Clair river cut-off channel which might be included in reply to the U.S. Embassy request for views, had been modified to require the United States to be responsible for all compensation to interests injured during the construction (not including the original compensation to the Indian band) and for any interests on the U.S. side in perpetuity after the channel was completed. He doubted, however, if the U.S. would accept this and do the work on our side. Canada's legal position and her sovereign position were adequately safeguarded if the U.S. were to build the channel as proposed.

26. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was no doubt of the value of the channel for navigation purposes but everything northwest of it would be inaccessible from the Canadian side. It was pointed out in reply that this area was inaccessible now and nobody lived there. The main interests affected seemed to be some wealthy duck hunters and a number of fishermen.

(b) The new channel would be a great help to the seaway and the money received by the Indians would be put to good use to improve the remainder of the Walpole Island reserve.

(c) Before reaching a decision the implications of the proposal should be discussed with representatives of the area.

27. The Cabinet deferred decision on the proposed St. Clair River cut-off channel pending consideration of its implications by Mr. Martin.

(PREVIOUS REFERENCE APRIL 26)

14. Mr. Martin said he was now satisfied that it was desirable to proceed with the proposed cut-off channel under the revised conditions which had been suggested.

(b) that Canada pay for compensation to the Walpole Island Indian Band for their interests in the land, and assume responsibility for compensating any interests in Canada for damage or loss suffered after the project was completed; and,

(c) that Canada be responsible for the maintenance and administration of the channel.

DETROIT RIVER; U.S. REQUEST FOR DREDGING

13. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, said the United States government had asked permission to undertake, in 1956, navigation improvements in the Canadian waters of the Detroit River. It was proposed to dredge existing channels and to build compensating dykes in order to provide the increased channel dimensions which had become necessary as a result of the growing needs of commerce. Although the dredging programme for 1956-57 was estimated to cost only $5 million, it was part of an overall project designed to improve the Great Lakes connecting channels and bring these shipping lanes up to the same standard as the St. Lawrence Seaway. The whole project was expected to cost $150 million. Although the U.S. were under no obligation to undertake those works, they had traditionally assumed that responsibility. Having regard to Canada's contribution in the channels at and below Montreal, the International Rapids section, and the Welland Canal, this arrangement seemed reasonable.

It was recommended that approval be given to the present proposal subject to the following conditions:

(a) The final plans for construction of the channel, including plans for spoil disposal areas and for the construction of the compensating dykes, would be approved by the Canadian government.

(b) Drilling, excavations, deposit of dredged and excavated materials, and construction of compensating dykes were not to be carried out in Canadian territory by any agencies or contractors until the Canadian government had made arrangements for the admission of personnel and equipment.

(c) The U.S. would accept the responsibility for safeguarding any interests, including navigation interests and the interests of riparian owners, against any harmful effects from the improvement of the existing channels; and for the cost of all remedial works in connection therewith; and for compensation to any such interests suffering any damage or loss resulting from such work.

(d) The works to be carried out in Canadian territory would be without prejudice to the sovereign rights of Canada.

(e) Canadian contractors would be given an equal opportunity with U.S. contractors to bid on that portion of the work which lay in Canadian territory; when, however, U.S. contractors were awarded contracts for work wholly in Canada, Canadian technicians, supervisory staff and workers would be given employment insofar as those of necessary qualifications were available, except where U.S. key and permanent personnel for dredges were essential; clearance in this regard to be made through the National Employment Service of Canada.

(f) Where U.S. contractors were awarded contracts for work in Canadian territory in the Detroit River, Canadian customs duties on the entry of U.S. dredges for this specific project would be waived.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum Secretary of State for External Affairs, Aug. 7, 1956 — Cab. Doc. 165-56†).

14. During the discussion it was pointed out that the U.S. government was not obliged in any way to assume the financial responsibility for these channel improvements. If conditions required by Canada were too rigid, the U.S. might refuse to undertake this work and the Canadian government might have to do it. It was probably unreasonable to require that Canadian workers should be given employment. The condition related to Canadian customs did not seem necessary since the precedent had been established over the past seventy years that dredging done by the U.S. in Canadian waters in the upper lakes was not subject to Canadian duties.

15. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on a U.S. request to undertake navigation improvements this year in the Canadian waters of the Detroit River, and agreed that such a request be granted under the conditions outlined in the circulated memorandum (Cab. Doc. 165-56) but revised by the Department of External Affairs in consultation with the Department of Labour in the light of the discussion; it being understood that questions of waiver of customs duties would not be mentioned in the reply but dealt with in the usual manner.[203]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 43-57 Ottawa, February 19, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

DREDGING BY THE UNITED STATES IN THE ST. MARYS AND ST. CLAIR RIVER SECTIONS OF THE GREAT LAKES CONNECTING CHANNELS

The United States Government intends to make navigation improvements by dredging in the waters of the St. Marys and the St. Clair River sections of the Great Lakes connecting channels, exclusive of the Southeast Bend of the St. Clair River. Between 3% and 6% of the dredging will be done on the Canadian side of the Boundary and Canadian Government approval has been requested.

The Government of the United States will bear the full cost of the projects which are designed to provide for the growing needs of commerce and will involve the deepening of existing channels and the disposal of excavated materials. The construction programme for the current United States fiscal year, which ends June 30, 1957, includes commencement of work in the St. Marys River, and it is anticipated that work in the St. Clair River will begin in the next fiscal year. On August 10, 1956, Cabinet approved conditions for a similar dredging project in the Detroit River.

The United States proposal as outlined appears to be generally satisfactory. Since it is desirable to improve and deepen the connecting channels for the upper Great Lakes, approval is recommended subject to the conditions outlined below. If Canada does not agree to the projects, the Government of the United States could apply to the International Joint Commission for approval pursuant to Article III of the Boundary Waters Act of 1909.

In the Detroit River project, nearly all the dredging was in Canadian territory and consequently one of our conditions was that Canadian contractors should be given an equal opportunity with United States contractors to bid on the work, and there was a further proviso on the employment of Canadian workers. Since the percentage of dredging to be done in Canadian waters in the present projects is relatively small and scattered through various sections of the rivers, it is not considered suitable for separate contracts. The estimated cost of the entire project as proposed is approximately $16 million for the St. Clair River and $40 million for the St. Marys River. A request for equal opportunities for Canadian contractors to bid on the parts of these projects in Canada would undoubtedly add considerably to the overall cost and make the work much more difficult to carry out. It is accordingly recommended that, while our Note of Approval should draw attention to the precedent created by the conditions contained in our Detroit River Note requiring equal opportunities for Canadian contractors to bid on parts of the project and employment of Canadian labour, it should specifically waive such conditions with respect to the present projects.

The project in the St. Marys River may have the effect of lowering the depth of water over the Canadian lower lock sill at Sault Ste. Marie by about 0.17 foot and in addition it may change the amount of water flowing in Canadian channels in the vicinity of St. Marys Falls and the St. Marys River. In discussions between Canadian and United States engineers the latter considered that the reduction in water levels would have a negligible effect and they accordingly made no plans for any compensatory works. The Canadian engineers believe that the lowering of the levels will somewhat reduce the usefulness of the Canadian lock. Since, however, it is in the Canadian interest to facilitate the present undertaking and since it is the practice for all deeper draft freighters to use the locks on the American side, it is questionable whether construction of costly compensatory works by the United States is warranted. Nonetheless, with the expected increase in Great Lakes traffic, the Canadian Government may wish at some future date to make improvements to the Canadian lock at Sault Ste. Marie and these improvements may affect levels on the United States side of the International Boundary. It is proposed, therefore, that our Note agreeing to the present projects might request the United States Government to give assurances that they will be prepared to facilitate as far as possible the construction by Canada of improvements to the Canadian canal facilities at Sault Ste. Marie if and when such work is considered necessary.

The main conditions of our approval would, therefore, be as follows:

(a) That the final plans for the construction of the channels, including plans for spoil disposal areas, shall be approved by the Canadian Government.

(b) That the United States authorities will ensure, in a manner satisfactory to the Canadian authorities, that the contractor or contractors for this work will, as a matter of contract responsibility, be required to:

(1) perform and complete the work in accordance with the plans and specifications as approved by the Canadian authorities;

(2) be responsible for all damage to persons or property that occur in Canada as a result of their fault or negligence in connection with the prosecution of the work;

(3) carry adequate insurance commensurate to that responsibility.

The regular standard conditions in connection with the request will also be included in the reply to the United States Note.

It is further proposed that Canadian customs duties and excise taxes in respect of equipment, materials and supplies used or consumed in connection with the projects for dredging in boundary waters of the Canadian side of the St. Marys and St. Clair Rivers, should be waived. This remission shall not extend to items for personal use including tobacco, food and beverages actually landed in Canada.

Recommendations

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister of Transport, recommends that the Government of Canada agree to permit the Government of the United States to proceed with the projects subject to conditions along the lines of the above, and subject also to assurances being given by the Government of the United States that it will for its part, facilitate as far as possible, the construction by Canada of improvements to the Canadian canal facilities at Sault Ste. Marie if and when such work is considered necessary; the United States Note requesting approval, the Canadian Note and the United States Note in reply to constitute a "special agreement" within the meaning of Article III of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.[204]

FORTHCOMING NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES FOR A CONVENTION ON PINK SALMON

We have been informed by the Deputy Minister of Fisheries of a recent discussion with United States Fisheries officials about a convention for pink salmon. The Department of Fisheries have felt for some time that it would be desirable to bring Pacific coast pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Convention, and to provide for some type of regulation as now applies for sockeye salmon, and for a division of the catch between the United States and Canada. Mr. Sinclair made a public speech along these lines several weeks ago, at a meeting of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union, in Vancouver. At the end of April, this matter was discussed with United States officials, and it was decided that there should be negotiations on a pink salmon convention similar to the Sockeye Salmon Convention, and the date for these negotiations was tentatively set for next September.

It is proposed that the convention should be placed under the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, which now administers the Sockeye Salmon Convention. At the same time, the Canadian Department of Fisheries would seek to have the status of the Commission altered somewhat, to bring it more under the authority of the two governments, and thus bring it into line with the more recent fisheries conservation conventions. It was decided that the Japanese Government would be notified confidentially well in advance of the intention to start these negotiations.

PINK SALMON NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

We have agreed with the United States to hold a conference in Ottawa on October 22, 1956, on pink salmon in the Fraser River area. The purpose of the conference will be to put pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Convention, probably by a protocol to the convention.

2. We have sent you copies of correspondence and memoranda on this subject. From these you will see that, although practical considerations favour the course we are following, the Japanese Government might have an argument for maintaining that pink salmon conservation measures should come under the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean, if it wished to do so. You will recall that pink salmon are among the species listed in the annex to the Convention, to which the abstention principle applies. The State Department and ourselves feel that it is perfectly consonant with our obligations under the North Pacific Convention for us to put pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Convention. Nevertheless, in view of the importance of the provisions of the North Pacific Convention to our west coast fisheries, it is desirable that we should act in accordance with the spirit as well as the letter of the Convention, and that we should give careful consideration to any allegations which the Japanese Government might make that we are not doing so.

3. It has been decided that similar notes should be delivered to the Japanese Foreign Ministry by the United States Embassy and by you, notifying the ministry of our intentions. My immediately following telegram contains the text of the proposed Canadian note. You will see that the note does not mention the North Pacific Convention nor the legal aspect. As we consider that our course is consonant with our obligations under the North Pacific Convention, we do not want to suggest that there may be legal difficulties, and we certainly do not want to appear to seek Japanese consent for what we are planning to do. If the Japanese react strongly before October 22, and maintain that pink salmon conservation measures should come under the North Pacific Convention, then we will consult with the United States and we will also consider the possibility of postponing the conference.

4. The United States authorities have shown us the text of their proposed note. It is similar to ours, except that it refers to putting various species of salmon, and not just pink salmon, under the Sockeye Salmon Convention. As the meeting on October 22 will only consider pink salmon, we are suggesting to the State Department that their note to the Japanese should refer only to pink salmon and not to other species. Apart from this point, we consider that the differences which exist between their note and ours are not material. As we are anxious to give this notification to the Japanese at the beginning of next week, we suggest that the notes could be delivered in their present slightly different form, rather than spend more time in drafting identical texts. I should therefore be obliged if you would, in consultation with the United States Embassy, deliver the note as soon as possible, provided that the United States note has been altered to refer only to pink salmon. Please notify us when the note is delivered.

PINK SALMON NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

The following is the text of the note for delivery to the Japanese Foreign Ministry. Text Begins:

The Canadian Embassy presents its compliments to the Japanese Foreign Ministry, and has the honour to inform the ministry of a new step for the conservation of fish resources which the Canadian Government is planning to take in conjunction with the United States Government. The Convention between Canada and the United States of May 26, 1930, concerning the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser River system, provides for certain measures for the protection, preservation and extension of these fisheries. Intermingled with the sockeye salmon in the waters to which the convention applies, are pink salmon stocks. The extensive and complex conservation measures required for sockeye salmon in these waters increasingly affect pink salmon in the same area and in the spawning streams. Conversely, conservation measures which have been adopted independently by the two governmental authorities in respect of pink salmon in this area affect sockeye salmon. It is therefore necessary that the regulation and study of these two stocks be co-ordinated throughout the area.

The International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, which has been operating since 1937,[205] has an organization and staff working throughout the convention area on the sockeye stocks. To accomplish the necessary co-ordination of work on both salmon stocks, it appears most practicable that the functions of this existing commission be expanded to include responsibility for the pink salmon stocks intermingled with the sockeye salmon stocks in the same area. Accordingly, the United States and Canadian Governments are planning to hold a conference on or about October 22, 1956, for the purpose of modifying the Sockeye Salmon Convention in order to give the commission the necessary authority.

In view of the deep interest of the Government of Japan in every action designed to promote the effective and efficient conservation of the living resources of the North Pacific Ocean, the Canadian Embassy is pleased to inform the ministry of this new step looking toward the more effective and efficient management of the pink salmon stocks mentioned above. Text ends. Message ends.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 3, 1956

PINK SALMON CONSERVATION AGREEMENT

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a draft memorandum to Cabinet† on the subject of a pink salmon conservation agreement. This draft memorandum has been approved by the Department of Fisheries.

2. The memorandum provides for placing pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Commission, and it is largely a question of making the best conservation arrangements for pink salmon. There are, however, two aspects that are of interest to this Department.

3. In the first place, as is pointed out in the memorandum, the Japanese Government may object to the proposed action on the grounds that any new conservation arrangements for fish in the North Pacific should come within the framework of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention. We are arranging, in conjunction with the United States authorities, to notify the Japanese within the next day or two of the proposed action. This will give them an opportunity to argue that the new arrangements should come under the North Pacific Fisheries Convention, if they choose to do so. If they do put forward such an argument, then it is proposed that we should consult with the United States authorities about going ahead with the new pink salmon arrangement. It might be desirable to postpone the conference on pink salmon, or we might arrange for a Japanese observer to be present, or some other way might be found to show that we take our obligations under the North Pacific Fisheries Convention seriously, and that we are anxious to act in concert with Japan in this whole field. It is, of course, important to us to observe the spirit as well as the letter of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention, as its observance by Japan is of great consequence to our west coast fisheries.

4. The other point of interest to this Department is the proposed amendment to the Sockeye Salmon Convention, providing that the regulations of this Convention should be subject to Government approval. The Sockeye Salmon Convention, which was the first of the series of fish conservation conventions to be signed, gives the Commission a rather independent status comparable in some ways to that of the International Joint Commission. In the more recent fisheries conventions, the Commissioners have been made to some extent subject to Government direction. The proposal to bring the Sockeye Salmon Commission into line with the more recent ones is therefore reasonable, and it should certainly help in co-ordinating Government policy on fish and power questions in British Columbia.

PINK SALMON CONSERVATION; AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted a memorandum on an agreement with the United States on pink salmon conservation. A convention between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation, and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser River system had come into effect in 1938 with the establishment of the Sockeye Salmon Commission. The convention provided for an equal division of catch by fishermen of the two countries. Intermingled with the sockeye salmon of the Fraser River system were found stocks of pink salmon fished under conservation measures enacted independently by the two countries. The application of uniform conservation measures and fishing conditions was highly desirable, and could best be achieved by extending the authority of the Sockeye Salmon Commission to the pink salmon fisheries. Arrangements had been made for a conference of Canadian and U.S. officials in Ottawa on October 22nd, 1956, to negotiate an agreement to that effect. This agreement, when reached, would be expressed as a protocol to the Sockeye Salmon Convention. The Japanese government would be informed of this proposal and, if it took a strong stand that any international measures in respect of conservation of the pink salmon should be undertaken within the framework of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention, the Canadian and U.S. governments would consult and consider what further course of action should be followed.

It was also desirable to modify the convention to provide that all regulations made by the commission with respect to sockeye, as well as pink salmon, should be subject to approval by the two governments. This modification was necessary mainly because of the importance of the Fraser River as a source of potential water power and the consequent problems faced by Canada in co-ordinating policy as to the resources of the Fraser River.

8. The Minister of Fisheries recommended that the proposals made in the memorandum be adopted. He said that the acquisition of 25 large fishing vessels several years ago on the west coast had resulted in Canadian fishermen getting a much larger fraction of the pink salmon catch than before, which had improved Canadian bargaining power. Control of the catch by agreement would make it possible to rebuild the run of this type of salmon.

9. The Cabinet noted the report, as submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on an agreement with United States on pink salmon conservation and agreed,

(a) that a delegation, to be named by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation with the Minister of Fisheries, be authorized to negotiate a protocol to the Sockeye Salmon Convention providing for the inclusion of pink salmon in that convention, with any necessary modifications to meet special problems resulting from that inclusion, and providing also that the regulations of the commission on both sockeye and pink salmon be subject to the approval of the Canadian and U.S. governments; and

(b) that the head of the Canadian delegation and one other nominee be granted full power to sign a protocol containing the above provisions.

CONFERENCE ON PINK SALMON

You will recall that a meeting between Canada and the United States to consider a proposal to put pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Commission is to open in Ottawa on October 22. There have been two recent developments.

2. The Japanese Government was informed of the meeting by the Americans and ourselves ten days ago and they have asked for permission to have an observer attend. In consultation with the Department of Fisheries and with the United States authorities it has been agreed to accept this proposal and to invite a Japanese observer.

3. As part of the Canadian delegation there are to be "industry advisers", designated by the Minister of Fisheries. These will include representatives of the owners of fishing vessels and also Mr. Homer Stevens, Secretary of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union. Mr. Stevens is a member of the Labour Progressive Party and his union is communist-infiltrated. He has attended meetings of international fisheries commissions in Canada as a union representative. He is known to the United States authorities and has been refused admission to attend meetings in the United States.[206] We understand that the United States fisheries official are aware that he is to attend this meeting in Ottawa.

4. The presence of Mr. Stevens in the Canadian delegation may possibly occasion some criticism of the Government, either in the United States or domestically. I think that the proper reply to any criticism should be that the Government recognizes the interest of the union in the fisheries of the Pacific Coast, that Mr. Stevens is the union's chosen representative and that he will not attend meetings at which classified material will be discussed. Presumably, however, enquiries of this nature should be directed to the Department of Fisheries.

LETTER X-1340 Ottawa, November 12, 1956

PINK SALMON CONFERENCE

A conference on pink salmon was held between the United States and Canada in Ottawa from October 22 to 25. The conference decisions were embodied in a protocol to the Sockeye Salmon Convention,[207] a resolution†, and interpretative paragraphs for the minutes†, and copies of these and other conference papers† are attached. The protocol will be signed when it is approved by the two governments, probably about mid-November, and will require ratification later.

2. Article I of the protocol provides simply that the Convention shall apply to pink salmon in the same way that it now applies to sockeye salmon. This proviso will enter into effect when the protocol is ratified, and it is expected that the Sockeye Salmon Commission will start regulating pink salmon in 1957.

3. Article II of the protocol provides for the deletion of several phrases from Article IV of the Convention, to give the Commission more flexibility in making regulations.

4. Article III of the protocol provides that henceforward the regulations of the Sockeye Salmon Commission, relating either to sockeye or pink salmon, shall be subject to the approval of the two governments. This proposal was made by Canada and was intended to bring the Sockeye Commission into line with the fisheries commissions which have been established in recent international conventions. In the new commissions the commissioners are normally representatives of governments (who are instructed like government delegates to a conference) or representatives of industry. The commissioners under the Sockeye Salmon Convention, on the other hand, hold office for some years, and the Canadian commissioners have not been subject to government direction. It was felt desirable to bring the Commission more directly under the governments so that its work might be coordinated better with the work of the other international fisheries commissions. Moreover, it is also desirable that the work of the Commission should be subject to direction by governments, so that if a government takes a decision, for example, on policy towards Japan or on electric power development on the Fraser River, this decision would be reflected in the work of the Commission.

5. The Canadian delegation was particularly interested in this Article III of the protocol because the Commission works nearly entirely in Canadian territory. At first the United States delegation did not see the need for the amendment. A complication on the American side is the fact that the state governments, such as that of the State of Washington, have more power in fisheries matters than do the corresponding Canadian provinces. Moreover, it appears that whereas the Canadian Department of Fisheries has had some differences of opinion with the Sockeye Salmon Commissioners in recent years, there have not been the same difficulties on the United States side. However, the United States Delegation agreed to this article with a provision for giving the Commission power to make regulations that are necessary on a day-to-day basis, such as those for opening and closing fishing periods, and also arrangements for dealing with the situation which arises when governments fail to approve the Commission's recommendations. The reference to "emergency orders" provides for this contingency, and "emergency orders" are defined in one of the agreed paragraphs to appear in the minutes.

6. Article IV of the protocol extends to pink salmon the equal division of catch now applying to sockeye salmon. Article V provides for a representative of the processing branch of the industry on the Advisory Committee.

7. Article VI of the protocol deals with the co-ordination of research programmes between the research staff of the Sockeye Salmon Commission and government research agencies in Canada and the United States. The Sockeye Salmon Commission differs from the more recently created fisheries commissions in that it has its own research staff, whereas the research programmes of the other international commissions are carried out by the national research staffs. Here again the position is complicated on the United States side, as the State of Washington conducts a certain amount of research. The co-ordinated programme was decided upon as a means of postponing any decision on the extension of the convention area because of the addition of pink salmon. Pink salmon are found in various areas adjoining the convention waters where there are no sockeye salmon, and arguments were put forward by Canada to extend the convention area southward to Puget Sound and by the United States to extend the convention area northward to the Strait of Georgia. Eventually it was decided that the convention area should be left unaltered pending this scientific investigation.

8. The question of research co-ordination was raised at the conference in several ways. In the first place, the Canadian Delegation proposed that the protocol include a proviso that national research agencies could do research in the convention area, and this is covered in one of the agreed paragraphs for the minutes. The United States Delegation had a somewhat different proposal, namely that material gathered by the research staff of the Commission dealing with species other than sockeye salmon or pink salmon should be transmitted to the national research agencies, and this became Article VII of the protocol. It was considered undesirable to authorize the research staff of the Commission to operate in Puget Sound and the Strait of Georgia (outside the convention area), and accordingly it was agreed to institute a programme of research for these adjoining waters by the national research agencies which would be co-ordinated with the research programme of the Commission staff.

9. To one accustomed to think of research as a matter of free exchange of information, particularly in a field such as fisheries, it was odd to hear the discussions about co-ordination of research. Apparently the development of the independent status of the Sockeye Salmon Commission in recent years has been accompanied by a lack of proper co-operation in research matters between its staff and the staff of the Canadian Fisheries Research Board. This is regrettable, as it is of great importance that fisheries research work on the Fraser River should be as complete as possible in view of the projects for the development of electric power on the Fraser. The research staff of the Sockeye Salmon Commission apparently suffers scientifically from its limited field of activity, whereas the Fisheries Research Board studies many kinds of fish over a large area. Since the basis of fisheries conservation by international agreement is that it be based on proper research, it is hoped that these provisions in the protocol and minutes will help to remedy the lack of exchanges between the different fisheries research agencies.

10. Although the conference was called to discuss pink salmon only, the question of offshore fishing inevitably bulked large. Canadian policy was, of course, set out in the note of October 12,[208] which you delivered to the State Department on this question. The note pointed out that in the past season some United States fishing vessels had taken salmon 30 to 40 miles off the Canadian Pacific coast, and that if this practice increased it would nullify all the conservation measures in effect on the Pacific coast. Canada proposed that both countries issue regulations prohibiting their nationals from "offshore" salmon fishing with nets. Canadian officials have in mind drawing a "fishing line" beyond which net fishing for salmon would be prohibited. This fishing line would be quite independent of the limit of territorial waters. At one place it might be a mile or so from the shore, at another, 15 miles or more offshore, and so the waters in which salmon net fishing would be prohibited would include both territorial waters and high seas. These Canadian ideas are still being developed, and were not fully explored with the Americans at the conference. In his speech at the opening of the conference, Mr. Sinclair emphasized the importance of the offshore fishing problem.

11. The United States authorities are equally concerned about offshore fishing, and anxious to seek a solution. In their case the state authorities make regulations for territorial waters, and the federal authorities for high seas. However, the Sockeye Salmon Commission includes both territorial waters and high seas in its jurisdiction. Hence the United States delegation argued that the best way to deal with the problem of offshore fishing was to extend the convention waters under the Sockeye Salmon Convention. This proposed extension of the convention area was, of course, for quite a different purpose than the proposed extension described in paragraph 7 above. The United States proposal was put forward forcefully and at one time was said to be a condition of American acceptance of the protocol.

12. The Canadian Delegation felt this proposal unsatisfactory, and favoured rather the drawing of a "fishing line". The Canadian Delegation argued that offshore fishing should be considered at a separate meeting, when plans for remedial action had been further developed in each country. It was eventually decided, therefore, to express the consensus of view of the conference on offshore fishing in a resolution, rather than attempt to deal with it at the pink salmon conference.

13. There had been some concern among both United States fisheries officials and our own in the weeks before the conference about the possible reaction of the Japanese authorities to the proposal for placing pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Commission. This concern arose because of the fact that Japanese authorities would have an argument, if they chose to make it, that any new international conservation arrangement for a species mentioned in the North Pacific Fisheries convention, between signatories to that convention, should come under the convention. Accordingly the Japanese authorities were informed about two weeks before the opening of the conference of the intention of the two governments to discuss arrangements for putting pink salmon under the Sockeye Salmon Commission. Several days before the conference opened the Japanese Government asked that a Japanese observer be permitted to attend. After consulting the Americans, we replied that a Japanese observer would be welcome to attend general meetings of the conference. Mr. Wada, the First Secretary of the Japanese Embassy in Ottawa, was appointed observer. He attended only the opening and closing sessions of the conference, as all the work was done in committee. He was briefed several times on the progress of the discussions by an officer of this department. He was also given copies of the conference documents. We feel that this was a reasonable arrangement because it would have been somewhat difficult to have an observer of another government present while the actual detailed negotiation of the protocol was taking place. It was quite obvious to Mr. Wada that he was excluded from all save formal meetings, and he may well have felt the arrangement rather undignified.

[208] Cette note, numéro 654, n'a pas été imprimée. Elle est fondée sur le document 310.
This note, Number 654, is not printed. It is based on Document 310.

14. The Japanese Government has also asked that the North Pacific Fisheries Commission be informed of the results of the conference, and the Canadian Delegation will make an appropriate statement to the Commission at its meeting this month in Seattle. We have not so far received any indication from the Japanese Government that they intend to argue that the action of the United States and Canada in putting pink salmon under the Sockeye Treaty is contrary to the spirit or provisions of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention.

15. There was some discussion of the status in law in Canada and the United States of the Commissioners and employees of the Sockeye Salmon Commission. This question also arose with respect to the officials of other international fisheries conventions when they operate in Canada and the United States, and it will be pursued through diplomatic channels.

HIGH SEAS SALMON FISHING

1. Following for your info only is the text of a letter of September 28 to the Minister from the Minister of Fisheries, together with an enclosed memo of the Deputy Minister of Fisheries. We shall be sending you instructions on this matter very shortly. Text begins:

My Dear Colleague,

A recent development in the fishing of salmon on the Pacific Coast is giving rise to serious concern and if the necessary restrictive action is too long delayed there can be no doubt that grave consequences will result.

The attached memo, prepared by my Deputy Minister, sets out in detail the problem and its serious nature. In my opinion it is evident that if we wait for action by the USA authorities, without bringing the matter formally to their attention, we will not get the desired action soon enough to prevent serious damage to the salmon fisheries of British Columbia, Washington and Oregon. As noted in the attached memo, the USA federal authorities recognize the seriousness of high-seas salmon fishing with nets and did take action to prohibit such fishing in waters off Alaska. What is required is a similar prohibition for the waters off Oregon, Washington and British Columbia.

I should be grateful if you would consider taking the matter up with the Government of the USA as quickly as possible.

Yours sincerely, James Sinclair.

Memo for Minister

A serious problem has arisen during the past two or three months in connection with salmon fishing on the Pacific Coast. The problem is one of "off-shore" net fishing, i.e., fishing beyond territorial limits by USA fishermen and to some extent by Canadian fishermen.

It is the view of Canada and the USA that fishing for salmon on the high seas is detrimental to conservation of the resources because it is impossible to determine the various stocks of salmon in high seas areas. Thus, conservation measures which are applied for the regulation of the various runs and stocks of salmon as they approach their respective spawning rivers are of no value if fishing is conducted say thirty, forty or fifty miles at sea. In order to protect the runs of salmon bound for spawning areas on the North American side of the Pacific, Japan agreed under the North Pacific Fisheries Convention to abstain from fishing salmon (as well as halibut and herring) in the eastern part of the Pacific Ocean. The fishermen of the USA and Canada have severely criticized the continued allowance of Japan to fish salmon in the high seas, even though under the North Pacific Fisheries Convention the Japanese operations are conducted on the western side of the Pacific. Now, however, there is a definite move on foot, particularly by USA fishermen, to fish salmon well outside territorial waters thus intercepting the runs before they separate to move in towards their home spawning rivers. Because of the recent activities of a fairly substantial group of USA fishermen to conduct "off-shore" salmon fishing, using exceptionally long gillnets, Canadian fishermen are planning to follow suit.

The current danger of American and Canadian fishermen starting to fish salmon on the high seas was recognized over a year ago. Discussions took place on the matter between the Canadian and USA sections of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission at the time of the meetings of the commission in November, 1955, at Tokyo. The USA section was in complete agreement with the Canadian section that action should be taken to ensure that the nationals of both countries should not be permitted to fish salmon with nets in the high seas. The question was again discussed between officials of the Department, the USA Fish and Wildlife Service and the USA State Department in Washington, DC on January 4, 1956. During the past summer the USA Government took regulatory action to prohibit USA nationals fishing for salmon with nets in the high seas off Alaska. I had a subsequent discussion on the problem as it pertains to the high seas off British Columbia, Washington and Oregon with officials of the USA fish and wildlife service, the State Department and the Canadian and American sections of the North Pacific Fisheries Commission in Seattle, Washington, on September 7, 1956.

The situation is that if high seas fishing for salmon by nationals of the USA and Canada is permitted to continue and develop it will have the effect of nullifying any arguments put forward to Japan (or for that matter other countries) that the taking of salmon in the high seas is destructive and contrary to good conservation practice and sound management of the resource. Added to this is the fact that if high seas fishing is permitted, our efforts to maintain and rehabilitate the salmon runs in British Columbia will be of no avail. This too would be the case in the efforts of the USA to maintain and develop the salmon runs to the streams and rivers of the states of Washington and Oregon. Moreover, the success of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission in rehabilitating the Fraser River sockeye salmon will be defeated.

The International Pacific Salmon (Sockeye) Fisheries Commission is already on record with both governments asking that action be taken to prevent the nationals of the USA and Canada from fishing salmon in the high seas. In the discussions noted above with officials of the USA we have pressed for action to be taken. Canada's position is that under current legislation we can adopt regulations to prevent Canadian fishermen from operating with nets on the high seas for salmon. We have hesitated to take such regulatory measures, however, until we are assured that similar steps will be taken by the USA. To date this has not been forthcoming because there is, apparently, a lack of federal USA legislative authority, except in Alaska where the USA Federal Government has direct jurisdiction over fisheries. At the meeting in Seattle on September 7 we were informed that it was impossible for action to be taken by the USA this fall but we were told by Mr. W.C. Herrington of the USA State Department that reasonable assurance could be given that action would be taken in time for the 1957 fishing season.

On September 13 a meeting was held in Vancouver by the Minister and officials of the Department with a group of representatives of the Canadian industry. The cannery operators and the fishermen's organization have expressed themselves as being strongly opposed to high seas fishing for salmon with nets. The British Columbia industry is acutely aware of the dangers from a conservation standpoint to the development of high seas salmon fishing. As a result of the discussion in Vancouver, the Department's Chief Supervisor of Fisheries for British Columbia was authorized to issue a notice to the Canadian industry. A copy of the notice,† dated September 13, is attached.

The officials of the Department concur that high seas salmon fishing of the kind now being developed, if not prohibited by governmental action by both the USA and Canada, can reach most serious proportions to the ultimate end of negating the conservation, expansion and rehabilitation of the salmon runs of the Pacific Coast. Equally serious is the effect such high seas fishing by USA and Canadian nationals will have in maintaining with Japan the abstention provisions of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention.

It is considered that the situation warrants a formal approach by the Department of External Affairs to the USA State Department, thus bringing the matter officially to the attention of the USA authorities and asking for assurance that legislative action will be taken prior to the commencement of the 1957 salmon fishing season to prohibit nationals of the USA from engaging in high seas salmon net fishing. It can be stated that Canada now has the necessary legislative authority and is prepared to implement it in so far as Canadian nationals are concerned. The officials of the Department are ready to confer with the appropriate USA officials to work out a standard description of the kind and type of salmon fishing gear which may continue to be employed in the high seas (trolling gear) and to describe uniformly the waters which will be considered to be high seas for the purposes of salmon net fishing.

Secretary of State of United States
to Ambassador in United States

[Washington], December 7, 1956

Excellency:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note No. 654 dated October 12, 1956,† on the subject of net fishing for salmon in Pacific Ocean waters off the coasts of the United States and Canada.

The United States Government is of the view that intensive net fishing for salmon in the high seas and territorial waters of those areas may defeat the domestic salmon conservation programs of our two countries as well as that of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission. It believes that our two Governments should together seek action to control such salmon fishing by their nationals uniformly in all such waters except in limited and clearly defined inshore areas.

I believe, therefore, that our two Governments are of one mind with regard to the threat of such net fishing by our nationals and of the desirability of concerted action to meet the problem. In this connection, I understand from conversations between officers of the Embassy and the Department of State that the term "off-shore areas" as used in Note No. 654 is to be construed to include both high seas and territorial waters.

You will be aware that at the Conference on Pink Salmon held in Ottawa October 22 to 25 delegations from our two countries, taking note of the statements of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission which you mention, joined in a resolution urging the Governments of the United States and Canada to take expeditious action to resolve the problem presented by the threatened development of intensive net fishing for salmon off the coasts of the United States and Canada.[209]

The United States Government has, as you indicate, already taken action whereby net fishing for salmon in certain waters off the coast of Alaska is prohibited to its nationals and vessels. The extension of control by authorities in the United States over salmon fishing in coastal waters to the south will require coordinated activity by the States of Washington, Oregon, and California and the Federal Government. The Department of State has this problem of coordinated action under study and is discussing with those three States and with the Pacific Marine Fisheries Commission the possibilities of State or Federal action or both in this matter.

I shall be pleased to communicate further with you in the near future regarding arrangements for a conference between officials of our two Governments with a view to coordinating action by our two countries to meet the problem arising from net fishing for salmon in coastal waters. Such a conference might also explore the subject of uniformity of regulations for salmon trolling.

Accept, etc.

Excellency:

I have the honor to refer further to your Note No. 654 of October 12, 1956† concerning the problems of regulating net fishing for salmon in Pacific Ocean waters off the coasts of the United States and Canada.

In my reply of December 7, 1956 I indicated that officials of the United States would be pleased to meet with Canadian officials on the whole subject of coordinated action on the regulation and control of oceanic fishing for salmon in the Pacific Ocean as soon as the Department of State should have discussed the matter with the Federal agencies and Pacific coast states concerned.

I am now happy to inform you that these discussions have taken place and representatives of the United States Government are prepared to meet with Canadian representatives in the near future on this subject. It is suggested that a conference might take place at Seattle, Washington from February 27 through March 1, 1957, the sessions to begin at 10:00 A.M. on February 27 at the Washington State Department Fisheries Building, 4015 20th Avenue West, Seattle. The conference would concern itself with (1) as is suggested in your Note No. 654, regulations governing salmon fishing by nationals of our respective countries in eastern Pacific Ocean waters, and (2) an exchange of views on possible regulations in other fisheries of the area common to our two countries.

I trust the suggested time and place of the conference may meet the convenience of your Government.

Accept, etc.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 18, 1957

PASSPORT APPLICATION FOR HOMER STEVENS TO ATTEND CONFERENCE ON OFF-SHORE FISHING IN SEATTLE

Under date of February 14, 1957, the Deputy Minister of Fisheries has written to us that he wishes to have Mr. Homer Stevens of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union accompany the Canadian delegation to a conference with American officials on the subject of off-shore salmon net fishing to be held in Seattle commencing February 27, and continuing for about three days.

2. As you know, Mr. Homer Stevens has not been acceptable to United States authorities on previous occasions on security grounds. However I understand from Mr. Clark that he discussed this matter with officials of the State Department in Washington on February 9. The attached telegram No. 353 of February 15† from the Embassy in Washington says:

"We are informed that if Stevens is accredited as an official rep of the Govt. of Canada to the conference in question and if he possesses a special passport with an A-2 visa, there will be no problem about his admission. The Visa Officer in State Dept. has undertaken to phone Mr. Berkley of the USA Embassy to arrange for the issuance of the visa on application."

3. Mr. Clark said that he would telephone Mr. Stevens and ask him to send to him a signed form of application for passport and say that he would endeavour to obtain a passport and U.S. visa so that Mr. Stevens could accompany the delegation.

4. In his letter† to us of February 14 the Deputy Minister of Fisheries states:

"Mr. Stevens would be a most valuable member of the Canadian advisory committee since he is extremely well acquainted with the off-shore salmon net fishing problem as well as the other subjects and, more so than any other individual, represents the majority of the fishermen of British Columbia.... I consider it extremely important that, if at all possible, Mr. Stevens be present as a member of the Canadian delegation."

5. It is our understanding that Fisheries Department considers it highly desirable that Mr. Stevens attend because if he and his union do not go along with the regulations devised at the forthcoming conference, implementation of any agreement reached will be most difficult. The problem of off-shore net fishing is urgent and, if not solved, could be most injurious to our efforts for conservation of the salmon fishing industry.

6. With respect to Mr. Stevens himself, it would seem that he is at liberty within Canada and is not at present accused of any wrong-doing. Furthermore, there is no expectation that he would cause us any embarrassment by attending this conference. I may say that he represented the fishermen at the pink salmon treaty negotiations in Ottawa a couple of months ago and was reported to have conducted himself acceptably at that time.[210] A point which may be worth careful consideration is whether a failure to have him attend the Seattle meeting would result in allegations that the U.S. Government, through use of its security requirements, was able to veto the membership of a Canadian delegation.

7. Presumably the passport issued to Mr. Stevens would indicate that it was solely for the purpose of attending this conference as an industry adviser to the Canadian delegation, and would be for a limited period of validity. Mr. Clark has assured me that he will be accompanying Mr. Stevens on the return journey and will lift his passport as soon as they have cleared Canadian customs and immigration. With respect to the type of passport to be used, I understand that you will speak with Mr. O'Brien to determine whether a regular passport with an inscription would be accepted rather than a special passport.[211]

OFF-SHORE SALMON FISHING

We attach a copy of a news release issued by the United States and Canadian delegates following the meetings held in Seattle, Wednesday and Thursday, February 27 and 28, 1957, concerning the conservation of the salmon fishing industry through the regulation of off-shore net salmon fishing.

2. Although the principal reason for the Conference was to discuss and come to an agreement on the conservation of the salmon, petrale sole fishery conservation was also included in the agenda.

3. The Conference was most interesting because both parties, and in this I include the States of Washington, Oregon, California, the territory of Alaska, the province of British Columbia, and both federal governments, were in complete agreement as to the necessity of making regulations which would insure the salmon industry would continue. New devices used in fishing during the years of 1955 and 1956 have frightened all salmon fishermen who have conservation in mind. Because of the new nets in seine and gill netting, some fishermen were catching salmon in international waters before the fish had a chance to go to their home streams to spawn. A fishery biologist informed us that two more years of such exploitation would have made the end of salmon on the Pacific Coast.

4. You will see from the news release that we are in agreement and from all indications the separate states will pass the necessary legislation for the regulation of off-shore fishing before this 1957 salmon season opens.

5. Agreement was also collected on the dates and size for trolling of salmon as well as the dates and size of catching bottom fish such as sole and rock cod.

6. I might mention that our Chairman, Mr. George R. Clark, Assistant [sic] Deputy Minister from the Department of Fisheries, was a most able leader of the Canadian Delegation and chiefly because of his efforts, the Conference was concluded on an agreeable note.

JAMES D. FOOTE

P.S. Mr. Clark's Assistant, Dr. William Sprules, informed us that a precis of the whole conference would be available to all interested parties within the next month.

News Release

Seattle, March 1, 1957

AGREEMENT REACHED ON U.S.-CANADIAN FISHERY REGULATIONS

United States and Canadian conferees today recommended coordinated regulations in the oceanic salmon and certain other fisheries in the Pacific Ocean. Nets in off-shore salmon fishing will not be permitted. The spring or chinook salmon troll fishing season will open not earlier than April 15 and will close October 31. The June 15 opening date on trolling for silvers or cohos will remain unchanged. Troll-caught chinook salmon will be required to be 26 inches minimum length or an equivalent minimum weight. In the petrale sole fishery, a uniform closed season from December 20th to April 15 will be established.

At present Canada does not have seasons for troll-caught chinooks or a minimum length regulation, or a season on petrale sole. The coast states this year have set an April 15 opening date for troll-caught chinook landings, and closed the petrale fishery from February 1 through April 15. Some net fishing for salmon has been carried out on the high seas exterior to tne Strait of Juan de Fuca. In 1955 a gill-net fishery in "outside" waters began to develop.

Washington, Oregon and California are moving the needed laws through the current Legislatures. Canada can put into effect by administrative action such regulations as are necessary. It is planned that this coordinated system of regulations will take effect in the three states and Canada in time for the coming fishing seasons. Failure of action in any one of the four jurisdictions may jeopardize the entire program.

The meeting represents a long step forward in securing coordination of regulations to conserve Pacific Coast fisheries. Hitherto, the measures of Washington, Oregon and California have been coordinated through the Pacific Marine Fisheries Commission. The recommendations of the conference when approved by the Legislatures and administrative action taken by Canada will mean that regulations along the entire Pacific Coast will be coordinated.

The meetings, which were held in the Salmon Bay Regional Office of the Washington Department of Fisheries, were attended by officials from Washington, D.C., Ottawa, members of the Legislatures and officials of the Pacific Coast states, as well as commissioners of the Pacific Marine Fisheries Commission and advisors from industry.

The recent growth of net salmon fishery threatened existing United States and Canadian salmon conservation programs. Such fishing already is forbidden in waters off the coast of Alaska by order to the Secretary of the Interior.

The conference also took note of a special problem which exists in the area adjacent to the Bonilla Point-Tatoosh Island line at the entrance to the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and agreed that mutual scientific studies would be inaugurated by Canada and the State of Washington in those waters.

Finally, arrangements on procedures for continued international review of coordinated regulations were reached.

In attendance were Canadian Delegates G.R. Clark, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Ottawa; Wm. M. Sprules, Department of Fisheries, Ottawa; and from the Department of Fisheries, Vancouver, B.C., A.J. Whitemore and C.R. Levelton.

Canadian Advisors were George T. Brajcich, Fishing Vessel Owners Association of British Columbia; John H. Johnson, Prince Rupert Fishermen's Cooperative Association at Prince Rupert; F. Probert and F. Rolley of British Columbia Gillnetters; James D. Foote, Canadian Consul; Homer Stevens and Mike J. Canic of United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union; Clarence Joe, Native Brotherhood of British Columbia; J. Cameron, International North Pacific Fisheries Commission; R. Nelson, D.F. Miller and S.R. Kask, Fisheries Research Board of Canada, Ottawa.

The United States Delegates were Wm. C. Herrington, Special Assistant to the Under-Secretary of State; Warren F. Looney, Department of State; W.M. Terry and John T. Gharrett of United States Fish and Wildlife Service; M.C. James, Director, Oregon Fish Commission; R.L. Jones, Chairman, Pacific Marine Fisheries Commission, Oregon; Richard S. Croker and Eugene D. Plancich, Fishermen's Packing Corporation, Anacortes; Nick Mladinick, Purse Sein Vessel Owners Association, Tacoma; and Milo C. Bell, Acting Director, Washington Department of Fisheries.

"Barney" Jackson and Representative Chet King of the Washington State Legislature; Representative Wm. H. Holmstrom, Chairman and Representative Robert G. NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEALS CONFERENCE

Mr. G.R. Clark, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, telephoned me today. He discussed the developments at the fur seals conference in Washington since January 10. (Previous developments were covered in my memorandum of January 10†).

2. The Canadian compromise proposal[213] was formally made to the conference on January 16 (copies of Mr. Clark's statement† to the conference will be circulated within the next few days). The statement was discussed by the members of the drafting committee of the conference on January 23 and on following days. The Japanese delegation accepted the proposal in principle, while indicating that they would like a number of changes made in it. This was a considerable concession for Japan to make. Early in January the Japanese delegation had proposed that Japanese fishermen be authorized to kill 30,000 seals per year off the Japanese coast. In private conversation, the delegation had reduced the proposed number of seals to be killed each year to 6,000. By accepting the Canadian proposal in principle, they would not be able to kill any seals at sea for several years, except those killed for scientific purposes. Generally speaking, the Japanese delegation had been very reasonable and forthcoming in private discussions in recent weeks. This applied particularly to Mr. Shima, the Minister of the Japanese Embassy in Washington and the active leader of the delegation.

3. The United States delegation expressed their general agreement with the Canadian proposal, but did not seem to support it very strongly. Although it appears that the United States delegation is anxious to reach an agreement at the conference, they have neither supported our efforts to reach a solution wholeheartedly, nor have they made any compromise proposals of their own. The continuance of the conference beyond the period originally envisaged is, of course, causing considerable administrative embarrassments to the State Department, and it may be that this is a factor in the attitude of the delegation.

4. The head of the USSR delegation, Mr. Striganov, has maintained firmly an attitude of opposition to pelagic sealing on any basis. He alleged that the conference was called by the United States to work out a convention prohibiting pelagic sealing and he has implied that the United States, by agreeing to the Canadian proposal with the implication that pelagic sealing may be possible sooner or later, is guilty of bad faith. The Soviet delegation has also been strongly opposed to the exchange of technical personnel which it is proposed would take place under the new fur seals organization. They have strongly objected to the conference discussing any arrangements for future programmes. Mr. Clark has had one or two private talks with Mr. Striganov in an attempt to secure a modification of the Soviet position. On the exchange of technical personnel particularly, he has pointed out that during his visit to the Soviet Union last year, Mr. Sinclair found the Soviet authorities quite keen on this idea. Nevertheless, the Soviet delegation have shown very little indication of willingness to compromise.

5. The prospects for reaching an agreement are thus not very good, and it remains for consideration whether there is anything further which the Canadian delegation could do to that end. As matters stand, the Soviet Union is isolated in its opposition to a reasonable compromise proposal and one which the Japanese have accepted even though it means a considerable departure from their original attitude. This is not, however, too satisfactory, because if the conference breaks up without reaching an agreement, the Soviet Union would be able, by virtue of their control of some of the seal herds, to bargain on a bilateral basis with Japan.

6. Mr. Clark said that he had briefed the Ambassador in Washington and Mr. Glazebrook fully on the proceedings of the conference on January 24.

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEAL CONFERENCE

We are sending forward by bag the documents obtained from the North Pacific Fur Seal Conference covering the period that Gilbert was away on sick leave. The following report will bring up-to-date the developments at the conference which has adjourned temporarily.

2. The Canadian proposal previously reported in our despatches†, though at first accepted in principle by the United States and Japan, finally proved unacceptable to the latter country because the proposal that the Commission should decide on the quantities of seals to be taken pelagically for research purposes posed the problem to Japan of the veto by any one of the participating countries in the Commission.

3. A U.S. draft convention submitted to the Principles and Drafting Committee on February 4th, although following very closely the Canadian proposals, offset the Japanese objection in that the decision as to the number of seals to be taken pelagically for research purposes is to be written into the treaty and can only modified by the Commission on which Japan, as one of the participants, would have veto powers.

4. The USSR have taken the attitude that because they had been invited by the U.S. to participate in the redrafting of the 1911 Convention and though they had agreed to the setting up of a commission, they had been misled by the U.S. and hence must get new instructions from their government on the basis of the U.S. draft treaty and the U.S.'s most recent proposals.

5. This is expected at a minimum to take a week but the USSR have undertaken to give at least two days notice for the calling of a meeting of the Principles and Drafting Committee.

6. Japan, which does not wish to make a statement until the Russians have made their position clear regarding the U.S. proposals, have given a similar undertaking with respect to the calling of a meeting.

7. Ozere and Fisher are returning to Ottawa awaiting notice from the secretariat as to future meetings.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 10, 1956

Attention: Mr. T. LeM. Carter

Dear Sir,

I have your memorandum of February 8th† enclosing copy of Telegram No. 222 of February 7th from the Embassy in Washington relative to the latest developments at the Fur Seals Conference.

I think I should draw your attention to the fact that the information given in paragraph 2 of the Embassy's message is not quite correct. The Japanese Delegation has not reversed its position on the Canadian proposal which was submitted on January 16th. The Canadian proposal deliberately (to which the Japanese and United States Delegations agreed in private discussion prior to presentation of the Canadian submission) omitted stating the number of seals which should be taken pelagically for scientific purposes. It was intended first to try to obtain agreement from all Delegations on the principles set out in the proposal and if this were successful to then discuss details which would include a minimum figure as to the number of seals which should be taken pelagically in connection with the research programme. We were well aware of the need to pre-determine during the Conference at least the minimum number of seals to be taken pelagically in order to avoid transferring the basic argument from the Conference to the contemplated International Fur Seals Commission.

The draft Convention submitted by the United States Delegation on February 4th follows almost identically the proposals by Canada and Japan. The essential difference is that the United States draft Convention provides in the Convention itself a section detailing the numbers of seals to be tagged and the number to be taken pelagically in connection with the research programme. The other slight difference is that the United States draft Convention provides that the Commission may, after the first year of operation, modify the numbers to be tagged and taken pelagically. The Canadian proposal has envisaged a review of the research programme in all its aspects and assessment of the scientific findings at the end of three years of operation. This difference is not a major one and could no doubt be reconciled fairly readily with the United States and Japan.

The question, however, which will require our careful consideration is the writing into the Convention itself of a definite commitment to tag a certain number of seals and a specified number of seals to be taken pelagically. From the Canadian point of view this may not be desirable because it would mean we would be compelled, under the provisions of a Convention, to carry out certain research (i.e. the taking of a specified number of seals pelagically) which in turn would mean committing Canada to assume financial obligations. This procedure would be entirely different to any other Fisheries Convention to which Canada is signatory. Normally, the procedure is for a Commission to "recommend" research programmes to the contracting Governments. This allows the Government concerned to decide how much of a financial burden it will assume. It seems to us the implied financial commitments in the United States draft makes it necessary for us to discuss this phase with officials of the Department of Finance (Treasury Board) before we would be in a position to comment on the United States proposal.

In the meantime, however, I attach copy of the draft Convention submitted by the United States. I should appreciate having your advice as quickly as possible whether or not you consider that Cabinet instructions of November 23rd, 1955,[214] to the Canadian Delegation authorizing it to negotiate a fur seal convention empowers us to negotiate a convention which would include specific financial commitments envisaged in paragraph 3 of Article II and in paragraph 2 of Article III of the United States draft.

I felt it desirable to point out to you the situation which has now developed at the Fur Seals Conference and particularly to correct the impression that the Japanese Delegation has changed its position with regard to agreement with the Canadian proposal of January 16th.

Yours very truly,
G.R. CLARK

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEAL CONFERENCE

1. We are forwarding to-day all the minutes of the various meetings that have been held since our last report.

2. The Convention has now come to the place where all countries have agreed to consider the draft convention submitted by the United States Delegation, P. and D. COM/41, February 4, 1956, along with the amendments that have been submitted by each delegation and reviewed by the others. It took the USSR 3 weeks to get a reply from Moscow as to their instructions. It would appear that we have now reached the final stages of this convention, however, it does not mean to say that progress will be any quicker than has been the case previously. As an example, it took all one meeting to consider the preamble to the convention and even yet agreement has not been reached on the wording of this preamble. The diametrically opposed wishes of the USSR and Japan keeps raising its ugly head. An example of this is that it took at least 2 hours to decide on a substitution for the word "extensive" in the last sentence of the third paragraph of the preamble. The Russian amendment was to strike out this word entirely. The Japanese first position was to have it maintained. It is fairly obvious why the disagreement by the two countries on this word.

3. The Japanese do not wish to give way at all on their position of being able to take a fairly substantial quantity of seals pelagically for scientific purposes. The Russians wish to cut down this number and have proposed 1500 fur seals, whereas the Japanese are seeking 6000. In general it would appear that the USSR's chief preoccupation in the drafting of this convention is to arrive at an agreement which will prohibit pelagic sealing with the exception of such for scientific purposes and to cut the numbers down in this case as small as possible. The Japanese on the other hand are setting their emphasis on scientific investigation, presumably for the purpose of proving the point that commercial pelagic sealing will not be detrimental to the conservation of the seal herds. The US and Canadian positions seem to be similar; that is the drafting of a convention for the conservation of the seal herds, though we emphasize that due regard must be given to the maximum yield of the other living marine resources of the area in question.

4. It is known through private conversations outside the committee meetings that the Japanese question the integrity of the Russians. With this background knowledge it is even possible in the committee to see from the statements made by the Japanese that this situation exists. As an example, a difficult situation has arisen between the Japanese and the Russians with respect to paragraph 1 of Article V. The US draft proposes that all persons and vessels subject to the jurisdiction of any of the parties shall, during the period that the measures set forth in Article II, paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 are carried out, be prohibited from engaging in pelagic sealing ... the USSR amendment proposes that pelagic sealing be prohibited "during the validity of this convention". The Russians put up a very logical argument for this amendment which merely from the point of logic it would be difficult to gainsay. However the Japanese flatly refused to consider any amendment to the US draft. The reason lying behind this is that the Japanese wish to have some hold over the Russians regarding Article II and its requirements for scientific research. All along the Japanese have questioned the figures of population and the statements made by the USSR concerning the herds on the Commander and Robben Islands. It is their intention to maintain some reciprocal agreement in this respect.

5. As you can see, this presents those wishing to draft a convention with a very difficult position where the integrity of the signatories is in question. At this date it is difficult to say how long negotiations will continue.

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEALS CONFERENCE

You may recall that this conference has pursued its even tenor in Washington since last November 28. One obstacle to the conclusion of a convention was removed with the signature of the Soviet-Japanese salmon agreement in Moscow recently. It now looks as if the situation is ripe for agreement. The principal matter remaining to be settled is that of the minimum total of seals to be maintained in the Russian-controlled islands. The attached telegram, No. 1042, from Washington, sets out a formula on this question which has been agreed to by the Canadian, United States and Japanese delegations, and which is to be presented to the conference today. If the formula is accepted, it is expected that agreement will be reached on the remainder of the text of a new fur seals convention in short order.

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEAL CONFERENCE

Following for G.R. Clark, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Ottawa from Gilbert: Begins:

Confirming our telephone conversation of today, it has been agreed that A.P. and D. Committee informal meeting of the Fur Seal Convention will be held at 10:30 a.m. on Tuesday, June 5th. The proposal that is to be considered is as follows:

"(a) Whenever the total number of seals frequenting the Commander or Robben breeding grounds as enumerated by official count of the USSR falls below the level of population determined by the Commission to be on either island during the first year of entry into effect of the Convention, the commercial sealing may be suspended on such breeding grounds until such time as the number of seals again reaches that level of population.

(b) Whenever the commercial sealing is suspended under subparagraph (a) above, the pelagic taking of seals for scientific purposes in the western Pacific Ocean shall be discontinued for the period of the suspension.

(c) The Commission may, subsequent to the second year of operation of the Convention, modify, the floor figure set forth in subparagraph (a) above in accordance with its scientific findings; and if any such modifications are made, subparagraph (a) shall be considered amended accordingly."

We have made reservations for Monday evening June 4th for Mr. Ozere who, we understand, will be attending this meeting, at the Tabard Inn, 1739 N St. N.W. Place of meeting will be Room 219, Annex 7, State Department.

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEAL CONVENTION

Confirming our telephone conversation of this afternoon the following is the text of the USSR revised proposal for Article III, paragraph 2 of the draft of the convention on fur seals of the north Pacific given at the meeting of the P and D. Committee today:

"2. A/ If the total number of seals frequenting the Commander Island breeding grounds decreases and falls below 50,000 head, enumerated by official count, then commercial sealing and apportionment of skins may be suspended by the Soviet Union until the number of seals again exceeds 50,000 head. This provision also applies to the fur seal herd of Robben Island, if the population of that herd becomes less than 50,000 head.

"The Soviet Union Government, suspending the mentioned sealing, notifies all the other participants of the Convention. In this case the Commission makes a decision about the reduction or the complete suspension of pelagic sealing for scientific purposes during the same period in the western part of the Pacific Ocean.

"B/ The Commission may, subsequent to the second year of operation of the Convention, modify the floor figure set forth in subparagraph "A" in accordance with scientific data received by it; and if any such modifications are made, subparagraph "A" shall be considered amended accordingly."

2. The delegates for Japan, the USA and ourselves asked that we be given time to study the USSR proposal and it was agreed that the P. and D. Committee meet again next Monday, June 18, at 2:30 PM.

3. May we be informed as to your instructions. If it is the intention to send someone from Ottawa to attend this meeting, may we be so advised in order that the necessary hotel reservation may be made.

NORTH PACIFIC FUR SEAL CONVENTION

Following for S.V. Ozere, Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Ottawa from Gilbert

As I promised you yesterday, I investigated the USA opinion concerning Article III. They agree that on the face of it the Russians have come a long way to meeting our (Japan, USA and Canada) wishes and by so doing, have indicated a keen desire to conclude a convention. Like ourselves, they feel that the most difficult stumbling block to reaching final agreement has now been removed but if the USSR's past performance is taken as an indication of future behaviour, it won't all be plain sailing to draft the final text of the Convention.

2. Looney told me yesterday that obviously the USSR wording needs some polishing up and that it is the USA intention to add a sentence to the effect that the life of the Convention should be extended by an equivalent length of time for that period in which pelagic sealing for scientific purposes might be held in abeyance due to the drop in population of the seal herds on either the Robben or Commander Islands below the agreed floor.

3. When the aforementioned USA proposal was last discussed with the Japanese, they demurred but Shima, Looney and myself are having an informal get together tomorrow morning and if Shima indicates the Japanese stand towards this USA proposal and should any other information of significance come out of the meeting, I will advise you tomorrow afternoon.[215]

[215] La délégation japonaise a accepté la proposition de l'Union soviétique, modifiée selon les recommandations des États-Unis, et après de longues négociations au sujet du projet de convention des États-Unis, le Comité des principes et de rédaction a finalement présenté un texte approuvé le 17 décembre 1956, à sa 81e réunion. CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 124-56 Ottawa, May 29, 1956

PROPOSALS FOR "CORRIDORS" ACROSS THE ALASKA PANHANDLE

Proposals

Proposals have been made, from time to time, that Canada should ask the United States for "corridors" through the Alaska Panhandle to facilitate the economic development of northwestern British Columbia and the Yukon. Interest in these proposals has been revived in the past two years. On February 8, 1954, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, indicated that the Government did not see adequate reason to initiate discussions with the United States and that present and prospective development in the Yukon did not require provision of "corridors". On April 12, 1956, the Member for Yukon requested in the House of Commons that the Secretary of State for External Affairs open negotiations with a view to securing four "accessways" on a 99-year lease or easement basis. There has been widespread public discussion of this proposal including suggestions, both in Canada and in the United States, of the concessions that might be made by Canada in some "deal" for corridors. It is becoming increasingly desirable that the Government should make clear its position on these proposals.

2. An interdepartmental committee, consisting of representatives of the Department of External Affairs, Northern Affairs and National Resources, Trade and Commerce, Mines and Technical Surveys, Transport, Labour and National Revenue has examined the problems arising from existence of the Panhandle and considered the various proposals for "corridors".

Corridor Proposals

3. The various proposals for corridors have not been altogether clear in their details, but they have usually taken one or another of three forms.

(a) True corridors in the European sense. It has been suggested that three or four corridors might be needed through the Panhandle. Each corridor would be a strip of land from the sea to Canadian territory which would be given to Canada either in perpetuity or on a very longterm lease — say, 99 years. The strip would be wide enough to carry a road and/or a railway and at its seaward end would cover a large enough area for a port.

(b) Exterritorial or special Canadian rights in a port or ports in Alaska and free transit for people and merchandise from the port to the Canadian border. What is entailed in these "rights" has never been precisely defined, but they would clearly include the application of Canadian Customs and Immigration laws for goods and people passing through the port en route to Canada, and also the application of Canadian labour laws and the right to use Canadian labour unions for workers servicing either Canadian ships in the port or transportation services from the port to the Canadian border.

(c) Free ports. These would be established in a case such as Skagway. A free port would presumably be a segregated area within the main port where goods destined for transshipment to another country would be landed and stored until they were transshipped. No U.S. customs duties would be charged on any goods disembarked into the free port and transshipped to Canada from it.

Problems Created by the "Panhandle"

4. There is no doubt but that the existence of the "Panhandle" of U.S. territory between the Yukon and Northern B.C. and the coast does create a number of problems. For the most part, however, they do not appear to be as serious as the proponents of the corridor schemes have suggested nor do they appear to be any more likely of solution by any corridor plan than by other and simpler administrative arrangements. The principal problems appear to be the following:

(a) Movement of Goods

Goods now move in bond through the Panhandle by reciprocal arrangement and in accord with the provision for freedom of transit under Article 5 of GATT. Considerable inconvenience is alleged to exist in clearing such goods through the United States Customs at Panhandle ports. The committee found that present arrangements for shipping and clearing goods generally do not present any serious problems in cases where an established traffic exists — such as from Skagway to Whitehorse. The arrangements are similar to those applicable to in-transit border traffic elsewhere in Canada. There is, however, a problem in some areas where there is no established traffic and where Canadian and U.S. Customs offices do not exist on the spot. Individual mining companies are required to pay for the services of special Canadian Customs Officers. A similar situation exists elsewhere, for example, lumber operations on the Quebec-Maine border. However, this particular difficulty would end as development proceeds for, with growth in traffic, the Department of National Revenue would increase the number of Customs offices. Furthermore, air transportation, particularly of prospectors — and their supplies — is assuming increasing importance. Since air transportation permits direct movement between Canadian points, it may be expected to reduce the difficulties in movement of goods (and persons) in cases where customs and other facilities do not exist.

It does not appear that any variant of corridor would help with such problems as exist. "Corridors" are not required in those areas where there is established traffic since the bonding arrangements present no special problems. A "free port" would simply add to the complications and the costs, because it would have to be guarded and policed, and goods moved from it to Canadian territory would have to be bonded in any event. "Corridors" would be of no substantial assistance to areas without established traffic, since presumably they would not be created unless there was, or was expected to be, a substantial traffic. In any such place customs services and bonding arrangements could be made available, and the problems would disappear.

(b) Movement of Persons

There is alleged inconvenience in clearing passengers through United States Immigration but the committee could not find that any special difficulties of serious consequence exist. There have been no difficulties in the case of Canadian and United States citizens. It has been reported that there have been some occasions when residents of Canada who were not Canadian citizens — and who require transit permits — have been refused entry by United States Immigration officials. As in the case of goods, increasing use of air transport will help to remove such difficulties as have arisen.

If there are any problems of consequence (which has not been shown) it seems apparent that they can be met as readily by administrative arrangements as by any corridor plan.

(c) High Wage Costs and Other Problems of United States Labour Unions

The high wage rates — higher than in Canada — and working conditions imposed by the stevedore union at Skagway — and other ports — add to the cost of handling goods. A railway strike at Skagway last fall tied up transportation into and out of the Yukon. It has been suggested that wage costs could be reduced and labour problems minimized if the workers handling the unloading, etc. could be in Canadian unions and subject to Canadian wage rates, etc.

There is some doubt whether United States labour unions do in fact make for a more difficult situation than would Canadian unions. Also there is a tendency toward equalization of wage rates in the two countries and increased mechanization will serve to reduce high labour costs. However, assuming that the problems are valid, they might be solved by a true "corridor", because the port would then be Canadian territory and the unions would be Canadian unions. They probably would not be solved, or even alleviated, by exterritoriality, because it seems virtually impossible that a Canadian union could exist and could operate at Canadian wage rates in an American port where American unions might also be operating at American wage rates. A free port would not help the labour problem at all.

(d) Shipping Problems from the "Jones Act" (U.S. Merchant Marine Act, 1920)

This Act prevents vessels other than American from carrying merchandise or passengers between points in the United States, even via a foreign port such as Vancouver; this prevents Canadian vessel participation in traffic, initiating in the United States, even from a Canadian port to an Alaska port and places other obstacles in the way of Canadian shipping in U.S. territory and the repair of American vessels in Canadian shipyards. This Act is clearly an irritant to Canadian shipping and ship repair interests, but it is not clear that it represents a serious obstacle to the development of those regions in Canada which are served by Panhandle ports. The one instance that has been specifically cited is the shipment of copper concentrates from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting mine at Tulsequah to Tacoma, Washington. Both the zinc and copper concentrates are shipped down the Taku River in shallow draft barges and are transferred to deeper draft barges at Taku Point, which is within the United States. The Straits Towing Company carries these concentrates down the coast in Canadian bottoms. They have had no difficulty with the zinc concentrates, which are landed at Vancouver, but they have had difficulty with their copper concentrates which are shipped directly to Tacoma, Washington. U.S. authorities have ruled that since these concentrates would be carried between two U.S. ports — Taku

Point and Tacoma — they must be shipped in U.S. bottoms. The Straits Towing Company have got around this restriction by carrying the concentrates from Taku Point to Vancouver in one barge and there transshipping them to another barge for carriage to Tacoma, but this transhipment costs an additional 75 cents per ton.

Any one of the three corridor variants might help with this problem. However, it is anything but clear that it is a serious problem. Moreover, if the U.S. were prepared to make special exceptions to the "Jones Act" for goods shipped from a "corridor" port in Alaska, it seems highly probable that they would be just as likely to make the exception, as a special arrangement, without the "corridor".

(e) Hindrance to General Economic Development. Existence of the Panhandle may have some general inhibiting effect on economic development because of the psychological deterrent to mining operators who tend to be reluctant to undertake operations through foreign territory. While the Government of Canada has received no official notice from the Government of British Columbia that the Panhandle hinders development of the northwestern part of the province, Premier Bennett, in a speech at Victoria on May 14 to the Pacific Northwest Trade Association, has referred to the province's need "of an outlet to the Pacific through the Alaska Panhandle".[216] As far as prospecting is concerned, however, it can be operated on the basis of air transportation and the Panhandle has no effect for that purpose. It is not at all clear that the Panhandle has had or will have any substantial effect on the pace of economic development. Nor does it appear that the concession of two or three corridors would affect the matter significantly. The country is very rugged and, except in the region tributary to Skagway, each corridor would give access to a somewhat limited area. A few corridors would not open up the whole hinterland, as is sometimes implied.

The Price of "Corridors"

5. It has been made clear in many of the comments by United States newspapers, and from other sources, that corridors are seen by them as part of an arrangement under which Canada would give in exchange rights of value to the United States. What is most frequently mentioned is some share of Canadian water resources (presumably the diversion of water from the Yukon River to the Skagway area) or the development "of the entire northwest as an economic unit". Any price along these lines would be extremely high in the long term. It is the sort of thing that could be contemplated only if it were established that the Panhandle has extremely injurious effects on the region behind it and that the only way of removing those effects would be through the negotiation of some corridor arrangement. Neither seems to be the case. It is, however, quite undesirable, particularly at a time when important discussions are about to be undertaken with the United States on water problems, to allow the impression to continue that Canada has an important interest in securing corridors and that possibly they can be made the means of getting substantial concessions from this country in return.

Possibility of Further Studies

6. If the Cabinet deems it desirable that further study be given to the matter, this study, in the view of the committee, could be carried out either by a Royal Commission or by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in co-operation with the other interested Government departments. An international committee of local residents, as advocated by the Member for Yukon and others, is not, in the opinion of the committee, a suitable agency for this purpose.

It is recommended, that a statement of policy be made soon on behalf of the Government in terms along the lines of the attached draft.†[217]

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

1. As you have learned from several quarters, the United Kingdom, perhaps prematurely, has taken up a very definite position on the common market proposals. This is that, by reason of its Commonwealth ties, the United Kingdom cannot itself participate in a common market and that, if progress is in fact to be made toward a greater measure of unity in Europe, the common market scheme must somehow be fitted into the broader European context.[1] While there is nothing in this position which is inconsistent with the terms on which the United Kingdom agreed to participate in the preliminary discussions at Brussels, its communication to the six governments busy trying to implement the Messina resolutions has proved pretty upsetting.

2. As far as I can see, the two steps which the United Kingdom has recently taken in relation to the common market proposals follow fairly directly from the premises on which the United Kingdom position is based. Looked at from London, participation in the plans for a common market would mean that the United Kingdom would have to accept an eventual commitment (i) to remove the preferential margins which it has promised Commonwealth producers to preserve, and (ii) to withdraw from overseas producers the assurance of tariff free entry of their products into the United Kingdom (except in the unlikely contingency that it would be able to persuade its partners in the common market project to place all Commonwealth products now admitted free of duty into the United Kingdom on a general European free list).

3. In informing the Six Powers that the United Kingdom would not be able to join the common market scheme, it was intended only to reaffirm, at a time when practical proposals were on the point of formulation, a proposition which had been made clear from the outset. And in carrying the common market issue into the OEEC forum, I assume that the United Kingdom wished to ensure not only that there was no duplication of functions but that the common market initiative would not split the OEEC wide open at a time when, in any case, that body is finding itself short of fresh avenues of activity.

4. The United Kingdom position and the steps by which it has recently been reiterated have naturally occasioned some resentment among the Six Powers and notably on the part of Spaak and Beyen. Just as there is a feeling on the part of the United Kingdom that the common market proposals should be considered in the OEEC forum before firm and irrevocable decisions have been taken at Brussels, so the Six Powers feel, not perhaps without justification, that the United Kingdom initiative at this stage was unhelpful and that it was deliberately intended to frustrate the common market proposals before final shape could be given to them. There is, of course, little advantage in the kind of mutual recrimination to which all this is bound to give rise and which is already threatening to spill over into organizations like the OEEC and NATO in which we are directly interested.

5. I gather from the minutes of the Continuing Committee and from your statement at the NATO Council meeting[2] that you are not entirely unsympathetic to the views of the United Kingdom. On the political plane we are naturally bound to favour any initiative which is designed to contribute to the greater strength and unity of Western Europe and which, in the process, weaves a fabric in which Western Germany can be firmly held. This has also, of course, been the traditional United States position. If our support for closer integration in Western Europe has been, on the whole, less forthright than that of the United States, it is because of our relatively more exposed trading position and the correspondingly greater injury which a closed economic system in Western Europe might do to our trading interests. It is on these general grounds that, as I understand it, we have tended to look warily at the current proposals for the creation of a common market.

6. There is no doubt a danger that a common market in Western Europe might tend to reinforce the existing pressures for protection in some of the participating countries. This implies a real possibility that the common market, once it has come into being, might be used as an excuse to justify the continuation of discrimination against dollar imports even after the balance of payments justification has ceased to be valid. If these dangers were of a temporary nature they should not, in themselves, seriously vitiate the general arguments in favour of the closer economic integration of Europe. But we do not, of course, have any assurance at this stage that the common market initiative may not bog down somewhere along the fifteen-year course which has been charted for it. If this were to happen, we might well be left in a position which was rather less favourable than our position at the present time when there is at least no serious retrogression from the objective of a freer world system of trade and payments.

7. However legitimate our fears about the effects of a common market may be, I hope very much that this will not prevent us, when the time comes, from taking a reasonably constructive line on the proposals which are now being developed. These proposals like those for the establishment of EDC, were received with a good deal of scepticism when they were first launched. They have now reached the stage where scepticism has given way to concern about their practical implications. This development is, I think, in itself evidence that the practicability of the common market scheme in one form or another is being taken much more seriously than it was a year ago.

[2] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 239.

8. I have been wondering in what form it might be possible for us to support the common market initiative without at the same time jeopardizing our own trading interests. My first thought has been that it might be possible to encourage progress toward the common market goal by way of a free-trade area; i.e. members of GATT not taking part in the six country exercise could agree not to claim the generalization under MFN of tariff reductions looking toward tariff removals that the six countries might wish to apply inter se. By the same token they would not be asked to agree to any increase of tariff rates against their products imported into the six countries. This would permit a commodity by commodity approach under which tariffs and other barriers to trade within the area could be abolished first perhaps on the bulkiest commodities such as fuels and building materials, without, initially at least, any alteration of tariffs against imports from seventh countries. Such a procedure should not, at the outset in any case, require the imposition of any internal re-export controls because transportation and handling costs are likely in such commodities to neutralize whatever tariff differentials there might be between existing national tariffs. The freedom of internal movement which already exists for steel and coal, coupled with similar freedom of movement for cement, lumber and similar bulky commodities, would tend in due course to equalize basic costs in certain sectors of the economies of the participating countries and this, in turn, should facilitate further progress toward the common market goal. Atomic materials could also, I assume, be freed without much difficulty since none of the countries participating in the common market is likely to be interested in putting its atomic industry at a disadvantage by levying high tariffs.

9. Any move along these general lines should serve to lessen rather than increase the element of restriction on imports from outside the common market area. Participating countries which were given a free hand to reduce or remove tariffs inter se, but were debarred from raising tariffs against non-participating countries, might soon find themselves subject to strong local and internal pressures to reduce their tariffs against non-participating countries in order to preserve the competitive position of their ports and transportation systems. Developments in this direction should prove attractive to the United Kingdom with the advantage it implies of more ready access to the prosperous market of Western Europe at a time when Sterling area trade is showing obvious signs of lagging behind the trade of the great industrial regions of Europe and North America.

10. I understand that there may be two objections to a scheme of this sort. The first is the fairly unanimous view among the six countries concerned that the sense of the Messina decisions implies the formation of a customs union. The Dutch, in particular, are evidently attached to the concept of a customs union in which they hope to play the part of the merchant and intermediary. The kind of scheme which I envisage is not, however, susceptible to objection on this scope. It is obviously a transitional scheme and as such is designed to facilitate the eventual establishment of a customs union rather than to frustrate it. Since it does not imply any form of internal re-export controls from the outset, it should also go some way toward meeting the Dutch position.

11. The second objection arises from the fact that the scheme entails progress by sectors. This is an approach which has not generally commended itself to the Messina powers and the Germans, specifically, have taken exception to it. It is, of course, by no means unlikely that, at one stage or another, there would be difficulty over the order of priority in which commodities should be freed from internal controls and tariffs. But I think that this kind of situation is equally likely to arise on the basis of the proposals which are currently being discussed at Brussels. It is, in fact, already clear that one sector, namely agriculture, will prove to be obdurate and will have to be left till reasonably near the end of the period over which the common market is to be established. In any proposals which it is intended to implement over fifteen years, it is the start which is important and difficult, and I feel that something like this would provide a relatively smooth, if slow, start.

12. Whether a start is made by way of a free-trade area or whether some steps are taken from the outset to rationalize external tariffs with a view to the eventual achievement of a full customs union, I am inclined to think that we need not be too rigidly guided by the provisions of Article XXIV of the GATT. The article obviously poses only minimum conditions and its very wording that "the provisions of this agreement shall not prevent . . . the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area" makes it clear that the contracting parties are left with a good deal of discretion in the matter.

13. Would it not be possible for us, therefore, to put our price for a waiver somewhat higher than the minimum terms set out in Article XXIV (5) of the GATT? What I have in mind is that we might require the countries proceeding toward a common market to undertake simultaneously to lower their external tariffs over a period of years under some such automatic formula as that put forward by the French in 1951. This would, I think, have certain immediate advantages. It would ensure that the common market initiative in Western Europe falls into place among the other measures which are being taken to free world trade. It would meet the position of the Benelux countries who have little inclination to raise their domestic costs by increasing their tariffs to suit the French. It might also, possibly, attract the Scandinavian countries into the common market. In terms of the common market countries themselves, of course, it would have the effect of automatically narrowing the differentials in their respective tariff levels while lowering the height of the fence which separates them from the world outside.

14. While the tariff reduction formula might be thought of as applicable in the first instance only to the countries of the common market, it would obviously be much more acceptable to them if it were taken up generally as part of a wider initiative toward lowering tariff barriers. This would depend, of course, on the attitude of the United States, but it is not impossible that this is a price which the United States would be willing to pay for a stronger Europe, especially since it could be shown to Congress that the formula satisfied the requirements of reciprocity.

15. At this stage, I think it important that we should not commit ourselves to a purely negative position which, as the experience of the United Kingdom has already shown, will earn us little sympathy in Europe and which may be blamed for their failure to get together on a common policy. I fully recognize the dangers which the common market proposals imply for Canadian interests, but I have a feeling that these dangers could be neutralized and the common market initiative turned to advantage by correlating it in one way or another with the collective approach to a freer trading world to which we are already committed.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 9, 1956

My Dear Spaak,

I had been hoping that the recent North Atlantic Council Meeting would have given me an opportunity of discussing European Integration matters with you. Unfortunately that Session — as usual — was so rushed that we had little or no chance to talk privately as the Council Meetings scarcely scratched the surface of the subject, so I hope you won't mind my writing to you informally to ask you how your mind is running on these questions to which you have been devoting so much thought and energy.

I think I understand the reasons for not launching a full-dress NATO discussion of the plans of the Messina countries at this time. Nevertheless as you probably gathered from my own statement on Article 2, I had hoped, without taking sides, to provoke more of a real exchange of views than actually took place. The Canadian Government is rather of two minds, insofar as we are concerned with the question of, for example, a common West European market; but I have the impression we may not have given sufficient weight, from the broad political point of view, to the reasons which are prompting the Messina countries to attempt further economic integration. You have been very helpful to us here in keeping Hébert fully informed on these developments, but I should be very grateful if you ever had time to give me in writing on a personal and confidential basis, some indication of your present thinking, particularly on the political aspects of your Messina endeavours.

We have, of course, been sounding a note of caution for some time on possible economic implications of the various regional European schemes that have at one time or another been discussed. This is partly, not exclusively — though it may be primarily, because of the way in which they might affect Canadian economic interests. We have also wondered about the consequences for the economies of the countries directly involved. That is, of course, for them to judge. In any case I want to tell you that, while not unmindful of questions of economic policy, I am also very interested in the political possibilities of closer association between the countries of Western Europe in fields in which they feel they can integrate their activities to their mutual advantage. I do not therefore want to take a narrow view of such undertakings as the establishment of a European Atomic Agency or of a common market for a large part of Western Europe.

With my very best wishes for the New Year,

Sincerely yours,
L.B. PEARSON

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

We have carefully studied Mr. Robertson's thought-provoking telegram 1769 of December 30. Mr. Wilgress has not yet seen it, but as he will not return to Paris until the last week of January, we are sending you some Delegation views on which Mr. Wilgress may wish to elaborate later.

2. We are in agreement with Mr. Robertson's objective of seeking a method of neutralizing the dangers of a Common European Market and of turning it to advantage by correlating it in one way or another with the collective approach to a freer trading world. It goes almost without saying that, given the political desirability of and support for European unification, we should look very carefully into all possibilities for securing this objective including an initiative directed toward increased European trade if this result will not unduly harm us or our multilateral objectives embodied in the GATT and IMF. Another question which may at least be worth considering is whether there are any realistic measures which we and other non-participating countries could take to prevent the Messina powers from forming a common market if they should decide to do so. If the answer to this question is that the common market could not be prevented by external pressure, then the range of policies which could be adopted by non-participating countries is narrowed considerably.

3. Since we are bound to favor any European initiative which is designed to contribute to the greater strength and unity of Western Europe and since provision is made in the GATT for the formation of customs unions and free trade areas it would appear extremely difficult to oppose categorically the Messina common market initiative. We are in complete agreement with Mr. Robertson's assessment of the dangers of the common market reinforcing existing pressures for restriction and of its bogging down after one or two stages of the fifteen year transitional period and in effect turning into a permanent or semi-permanent protective area. Our experience in dealing with the European countries concerned suggests that this result would be almost certain. Even if you share this categorical and pessimistic view, however, it would be quite unrealistic to suggest that this could be used as an effective argument for opposing the initiative for a Common Market. Our conclusion is that we would have no substantive grounds for opposing the institution of a common market provided that the Messina powers agreed to act in accordance with the provisions of GATT and because of our NATO association we would be unwise to take too negative an attitude.

4. This line of reasoning leads us back to Mr. Robertson's advice that we should seek to neutralize the dangers which the common market implies for Canadian interests and turn it as far as possible to advantage. A point worth remembering is that, although the common market is being taken seriously, there is still a strong possibility that the Messina governments will find it impossible to reach agreement among themselves on specific proposals. If the wind seems to be shifting in this direction, it would be important to consider what alternative initiatives might be put forward whose probable effects would be more in keeping with the objectives of the GATT and which would tend to redirect European thinking into multilateral channels. The common market initiative may, at least in part, be the result of the lack of recent new initiatives in the wider organizations.

5. If, on the other hand, the acceptance of specific proposals seems likely, we would agree that the question of how best to link the common market to the broader objectives of GATT and turn it to advantage should be carefully considered. Mr. Robertson, in his telegram, has made some interesting suggestions in this connection on which we are making some preliminary comments.

6. With regard to the first proposal that progress toward the common market might be encouraged by way of a free trade area in accordance with Article XXIV (5)b of GATT, we are not convinced at first glance that Canadian interests would necessarily be better protected by a free trade area than by a customs union. This would surely depend on the level of the common external tariff under a customs union, and, more particularly, the relative levels of the tariffs on our main exports. It is surely difficult to be categorical about such a question. It would appear that the main advantage of proceeding by way of a free trade area would be that the external barriers would not be changed and therefore could not be increased although our competitive position would worsen to the extent that internal tariffs were reduced.

7. We are also hesitant about the view that, if a free trade area were put in operation "participating countries ... might soon find themselves subject to strong local and internal pressures to reduce their tariffs against non-participating countries in order to preserve the competitive position of their own ports and transportation systems". Presumably this pressure is only likely if commodities are re-exported from one member country (with a low external tariff) to another member country (with a higher external tariff). But there are other pressures that would seek different solutions. The industries producing the imported commodities would be likely to demand protection and insist that the re-exporting member country should apply re-export controls. If re-export controls were ineffective or cumbersome, another solution might be a move to institute a common tariff and the net result might be to raise the external tariff of the low tariff country. Another consideration is that the rate of reduction of the internal tariffs may be affected if the external barriers are reduced so thus even the low tariff countries may be subject to conflicting interests. This is a complicated subject, and all we wish to point out is that economic forces could pull two ways — for the maintenance as well as for the reduction of the external tariffs of the high tariff members.

8. The Common Market Commission in Brussels considered the question of the timing of the institution of a common external tariff at some length. We reported in our letter 3632 of November 24† (paragraph 11) that some of the experts were in favour of maintaining national external tariffs until the final stages of the transitional period and were prepared to envisage re-export controls to prevent trans-shipment. It is difficult to envisage any very great priority being given by the common market countries to the formation of a common external tariff. The interests of both high and low tariff countries would probably make them postpone this step as long as possible; i.e., the low tariff countries would be loath to increase their costs by increasing their external tariffs while the high tariff countries would not wish to lower external protective barriers at a time when the effects of lowering the internal tariffs would be uncertain.

9. For these reasons, we would think that if a common market were, as seems likely, to be directed toward the goal of a customs union, it would probably, in practice, take the form of a free trade area during a considerable part if not all of the transitional period. After careful consideration of the Canadian interest, we might, if we considered it desirable, stress that the timing of the introduction of the common external tariff should be delayed. In this connection we feel that we should also stress the need for procedures for close consultation between countries affected by the tariff changes through the wider organizations. A final thought that occurs to us is that there may be danger in delaying the institution of the common tariff too long in view of the risk that such consultation would devolve into a process of bargaining vis-à-vis seventh countries.

10. Mr. Robertson's second suggestion is that we should raise the price of a GATT waiver by obliging the countries proceeding toward a common market to undertake simultaneously to lower their external tariffs over a period of years under an automatic formula. While it is not difficult to agree that this would be an ideal arrangement from our point of view and while agreeing that we should try to set our price as high as possible, we have hesitations about the practicability of asking so high a price. We feel that it would be difficult on legal grounds to refuse a waiver, if the common market countries agreed to act in accordance with Article XXIV and gave assurance of consultation. We cannot help thinking that it would not be realistic to attempt to exact an automatic reduction of the external tariff (or tariffs) of the common market countries and most unlikely that they would be able to accept such a price unless of course the United States and other countries were prepared to adopt similar automatic reductions for their own tariffs. We feel that the question of the reduction, apart from the consolidation, of the external tariff or tariffs should be considered as a separate issue and could not, for political if not legal reasons, be linked in more than general terms with the granting of a waiver. However, the whole question of the acceptable price for a waiver would have to be considered nearer the time for granting it when the situation would be clearer and the foregoing must be considered only as our preliminary thoughts on Mr. Robertson's provocative suggestion. One final idea which occurs to us is that, in the event that we might not find it feasible to require an automatic reduction of external tariffs in return for a waiver, we might well require an abolition of remaining QR's either on an automatic or near automatic basis.

11. A point of some importance which we have been considering for some time concerns the effect of the introduction of a common market on other international organizations and more specifically the part we play in them. We have not considered in any detail the effect on GATT of setting up a regional block of this size and consequence but the effect could obviously be harmful. OEEC poses a different problem. Regardless of what organizational arrangements were agreed to administer the common market, it may be anticipated that the OEEC would play an important continuing role by providing a forum for trade and payments negotiation aimed at fitting little Europe into the broader European context. The present policy of the United Kingdom seems to be to draw the Messina initiative into the OEEC and use this forum either to kill it or to modify it in such a way as to protect their trading interests. Other non-Messina countries can be assumed to be equally concerned to do this.

12. While it would be hazardous to guess what the organizational outcome would be, we think it is fair to anticipate that OEEC would take on a degree of permanence in the trade and payments field which we have never foreseen. We may be faced with important continuing negotiations in OEEC whose results might be of the greatest interest to Canada. For political reasons we should probably welcome a continuation of such broader European negotiation and from the point of view of our trading interests we might wish to consider whether we should not make more use of this organization as a forum for negotiation in the company of other European countries to which the common market countries are likely to be better disposed than toward the GATT membership at large.

13. While it is much too soon to see clearly what our interest would be, we feel we should not overlook the possibility that the OEEC (and perhaps primarily the OEEC) as well as the GATT may be an important forum for negotiation on matters directly affecting us for a long time to come if the common market is agreed.

[5] L'appel dans le document original disait « Mon cher Pearson ».
The salutation in the original read "Mon cher Pearson".

I write as confidential and as reflecting only my own views, for I am not absolutely sure of conveying exactly the thought of all my colleagues in the Belgian Government nor that of my colleagues, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs who met in Messina.

As you have correctly understood, the question of European integration must be examined from two points of view: political and economic. To me the one is as important as the other.

I do not need to tell you at length that the political situation of Europe is to me rather disquieting. At the moment of writing we do not know what will be the new French Government. Above all we do not know if this new French Government will have any stability. It seems to me difficult to avoid a Republican Front government, since the passions released in the course of the electoral campaign are still warm. But I doubt that such a government, which represents barely a third of the Assembly, could really resolve the few basic and very difficult questions which present themselves to France: the question of Algeria, the reform of institutions, the relaunching of Europe. I think that this attempt of the Republican Front will be short. Will it be succeeded by an attempt to form a National Union government? No one yet knows, and as I do not think that the newly elected Deputies will be inclined to face their electors again at an early date — a pessimistic but unfortunately a serious possibility — we are compelled to foresee for France a new period of political instability. That new test could be serious. Recent events have shown sufficiently clearly that there is already profound disaffection for French institutions in a large segment of the population. If political juggling continues this could lead very far.

This relatively serious situation which exists in France naturally has repercussions on the whole equilibrium of Europe. To the extent that France becomes politically weaker I think that there is — and this is easily understandable — a feeling in the United States tending to rely more on Germany. This constitutes a break in the equilibrium.

Unlike France, Germany is at present very stable politically and in a period of full economic expansion.

During the years of the vigorous and courageous leadership of Chancellor Adenauer, German policy has been directed wholly towards the Atlantic alliance and European integration. The discordant views of the German Socialists are explainable more in terms of domestic politics than from any fundamental opposition to the aims of foreign policy. For several months I have had the impression that it is no longer quite like that. Certain elements of the population in Germany are already slightly inebriated by their economic recovery and are also speculating on the political weakness of France, thus permitting to appear the first signs of a nationalism whose effects we know too well. This resurgent nationalism is complicated by the fact that a basis for it could be found in a rapprochement with the Russians. The German Nationalists consider themselves more intelligent and more clever than the Communists. They are not afraid of contacts and discussions. For my part, I am not sure that it would be possible for them to manoeuvre and I am afraid that these contacts could lead to very important and very big consequences for Europe.[6] It is on the basis of these two essential ideas, the situation of France and that of Germany, that I reach this strong conviction that we must as soon as possible and in as decisive a way as possible integrate Germany into a European organization and by means of European integration into NATO. It is not a question of putting on the brakes on German expansion but it is a question, however, of placing it in a framework in which its expansion does not constitute

[6] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Spaak gave no expression, however guarded, of these worries at the last NATO meeting. [L.B. Pearson] too great a danger to its neighbours. I can imagine no other policy towards Germany. We would then have only to submit to events. I am convinced that we have not much more time before us. If Chancellor Adenauer should for one reason or another be removed from active politics, the bad tendencies that I perceive in Germany would very certainly develop. In this connection, look at the positions already being taken on certain questions by the F.D.P.

As I have mentioned above, these efforts towards European integration have also their economic justification. It seems clear to me that the economic future belongs to the large population groupings. I am absolutely sure that if we succeed in creating a European market of 150 million people (that is about the population of the six countries of the Coal and Steel Community) we would witness a basic renewal and that completely fresh possibilities would emerge. I am, of course, aware of the fact that if a new economic community of this importance were to come into being it would present problems for the other European countries of the Continent and, of course, for the United Kingdom, as well as for the United States and Canada. What I wish to underline at present is that among the advocates of this integration there is no one who thinks that this new community, if it is to be organized, should be protectionist and self-sufficient. The great majority of the advocates of this idea believe that the relations between the new community and the other countries should be facilitated as much as possible, and what they wish is either that other countries should join them or that at least relations of close association should be created between the community and its new associates.

It is at this point that Article 2 of the Atlantic Pact takes on again its full meaning. As long as we shall be in NATO with the immense possibilities of the United States on the one hand and on the other the dust of divided European states, we shall not be able to do very much, as the conditions of real economic collaboration do not exist. If, on the contrary, a certain equilibrium could be reached between the United States of America and the united states of Europe, the dialogue to give real effect to Article 2 could usefully be begun.

I realize that my letter is already terribly long and even so I have the impression of still having many things to say to you. I should be glad to continue this conversation with you in whatever form and place you think useful, for example at an early meeting in Paris, but I hope that the few ideas which I have expressed will give you some useful food for thought on the problems raised in your letter.

P.H. SPAAK

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

On my return to the office from leave on January 23, Mr. Robertson's thought-provoking telegram under reference was brought to my attention and I have since been giving it careful thought. I have also read over our Delegation telegram 64 of January 13 and find that it covers the position very well from our point of view. However, it might be useful if I add some comments of my own in elaboration of the Delegation telegram.

2. We have to take seriously the proposals for a common market not so much that there is a possibility that the proposals will be realized in their entirety as that there is the possibility the six countries may agree and partly carry out steps towards a common market which would have the effect of creating in a most important segment of the free world a protective group discriminating against outside countries. I do not think that our worries emanate chiefly from the narrow effects this may have on our trading interests because the economies of the six countries are largely complementary to the Canadian economy so far as external trade is concerned. The example which the group set could have most unfortunate repercussions throughout the world and we might find ourselves faced with the creation of a number of similar protective groups the combined effect of which would be most prejudicial to our trading interests. Such a movement could also have frustrating effects on the multilateral approach towards freer international trade and payments.

3. At the conclusion of the last NATO ministerial meeting Mr. Bech, the wise elder statesman of Luxembourg, smilingly told me that if those who were worried about the common market approach could sit in as he had done at the ministerial discussions, their worries would vanish. I think that this is a sound observation because there have been a succession of proposals for customs unions all of which have not proceeded beyond the preliminary talking stage. I can mention in this connection the proposal for a Franco-Italian customs union and the proposal for a Scandinavian customs union. The danger of the Brussels proposals, however, stems from the emotional vigour with which they are being pursued by the proponents of European integration. It is for this reason that we cannot adopt too strong an attitude in opposition to these proposals. The political objective of European integration, as a means of tying the Federal Republic of Germany more securely to the West, is one which must have our sympathy and support on political grounds. It is just because of this that we are faced with a difficult dilemma and should make known at every appropriate occasion our fears about what may develop in the name of European integration.

4. It is significant that Monnet's [group corrupt] Committee for a United States of Europe, while supporting the idea of a common market, have stressed the need of giving priority to the setting up of a supranational agency for the development of nuclear energy. This emphasis on Euratom rather than on the common market indicates clearly that they are fully aware of the almost insuperable difficulties of bringing into effect the customs union proposals worked out at Brussels.

5. We have seen that the Brussels proposals for a common market have been hedged with a variety of escape clauses. This is only to be expected when one is dealing with the almost impossible task of reconciling the divergent interests of the low-tariff Benelux countries with those of the other three high-tariff and strongly protectionist countries. The Benelux countries are anxious to obtain a wider market for their industries and more scope for their intermediaries and strategically located ports. At the other extreme we have France with an economy isolated for many years from foreign competition and with strongly entrenched vested interests in protectionism. At the same time there is now in power in France a government supported by parties dedicated to European integration. Out of this might very well come an agreement looking towards a common market by stages with manifold escape clauses. If such an agreement could be reached we can be quite sure that France, for one, would soon invoke the escape clauses. We would thus be left with the worst of both worlds and with the unfavourable effects I have briefly touched upon in paragraph 2 of this telegram.

6. All of this points to the desirability of bringing influence to bear in attempting to steer the six countries in some other more realistic and practical direction. We can therefore be very grateful to Mr. Robertson for having directed our thoughts along these lines. This is a subject which should be followed up with as much thought and discussion as we are able to give to it. Unfortunately, I do not think that the proposals he has outlined offer much hope of attaining the objective we have in mind. They would still leave us with the dangers I have indicated in paragraph 2 and would create almost as many problems as they attempt to solve. It is not likely that we could persuade the Brussels countries to retreat from their customs union objective to a sector-by-sector approach under the free trade area concept of Article XXIV of GATT. The proposal that tariffs and other barriers to trade within the area could be abolished first on bulky commodities is an ingenious one but I do not think that it entirely solves the problem of internal re-export controls. The disparity between the Benelux tariffs and those of the three larger countries is so great that even on bulky commodities the latter group of countries might require re-export controls. In this connection we must remember that Antwerp is a convenient port for a large consuming area of France and Antwerp and Rotterdam are the main ports of entry for the most important consuming area of the Federal Republic.

7. Nor does Mr. Robertson's suggestion of securing the agreement of the six countries to an automatic plan of tariff reduction appear to offer much hope as a way out of our difficulty. In the GATT discussions France has always taken the firm line that there could be no consideration of an automatic plan for tariff reduction without the full participation of the U.S. Any initiative that we might take in this direction is sure to run up against the same obstacle and could involve us in unprofitable bargaining.

8. While we would have the right to insist upon the minimum conditions for the granting of any waiver for a free trade area or customs union conforming to the criteria of Article XXIV of GATT, our bargaining position would be weak on account of the political arguments in favour of the granting of the waiver. This makes it important that we should endeavour to make known our misgivings not so much about the effect on our own narrow trading interests of a possible agreement that might be submitted to GATT but chiefly about the effect on our main objective of maintaining the multilateral approach to freer international trade and payments. Besides, we have to take account of British and Scandinavian misgivings and have regard to the unity of the North Atlantic community. We have to consider what effect action by six countries might have not only on co-operation within Europe generally but on the broader aspect of co-operation among the countries of the North Atlantic community.

9. While therefore I agree that for political reasons we should be unwise to take too negative an attitude towards the proposals for a common market, we would be doing a disservice not only to our own interests but to the interests of all the Atlantic countries, including the six countries concerned, if we did not let them know that we have certain reservations about the proposals of which the first outlines have been formulated in Brussels.

[L.D.] WILGRESS

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 3, 1956

VISIT OF SIR ANTHONY EDEN AND MR. LLOYD EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Background

At Messina, Sicily, last June the Foreign Ministers of the six countries which are members of the European Coal and Steel Community agreed that it was "necessary to work for the establishment of a united Europe by the development of common institutions, the progressive fusion of national economies, the creation of a common market and the progressive harmonization of their social policies". The common market envisaged was a customs union involving the progressive abolition of tariff and quantitative restrictions among its members and the establishment of a common tariff barrier vis-à-vis non-member countries.

2. Under the authority of the Messina Resolution several commissions of governmental experts were set up. The Common Market Commission has now reported with a reasonable degree of unanimity as to the basic aims. The experts have reached the view that the internal tariffs should in principle be reduced to zero within 10 to 15 years. They have also pronounced themselves in favour of a customs union with a common tariff vis-à-vis third countries. But while there has been a reaffirmation of objectives by Ministers since the experts prepared their report, there has been no agreement on the precise method of moving forward, nor on the timing, nor (except in general terms) on the important question of the eventual level of the tariff against non-member countries. These differences of opinion among the experts reflect stubborn differences between the points of view of the six countries, based upon their present economic policies and situations — differences for example between the highly protectionist attitude of the French and the low-tariff policies of Benelux.

3. It is clear that the primary purpose of the common market proposals is political; i.e., to provide a western framework in which Germany can more securely be accommodated and to provide a political force greater than the present sum of its component parts. But there is also an economic motive, based upon the belief that a customs union might result in a more rational use of economic resources, with an economic base more nearly comparable with that of the United States or the USSR.

United States Attitude

4. The United States Government, as President Eisenhower said in his "State of the Union Message", has decided to support moves towards Western European Integration, including the common market.[7] Although their decision has been made mainly for political reasons — not least in response to Chancellor Adenauer's strong appeals for United States help in tying Germany more firmly to her Western partners on the Continent — the economic advantages (as they see it) of eliminating internal trade barriers throughout a large part of Western Europe are attractive to the United States. The United States would not suffer proportionately as much as we would from increased discrimination, if that were the net result of a common market, and it might be able to reduce its foreign aid programme to these countries if, in fact, they were able to meet a larger proportion of their own economic and defence requirements, or if the contention that the common market would have these effects could be used as an excuse for cutting down aid to Europe.

[7] Voir/See United States, Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Dwight D. Eisenhower 1956, Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1958, pp. 1-27.

5. The United States Government is, however, not unmindful of the need to maintain its bargaining position with the Western European countries in the event that they decide to establish a customs union.

United Kingdom Attitude

6. The United Kingdom Government are not prepared to participate. They have given these as "among the main reasons":

(a) participation "would substantially weaken the Commonwealth relationship both economically and politically"; and

(b) it would be "inconsistent with our existing policies for freeing trade and payments".

Not only are they unwilling to participate; they see dangers in the present proposals of the six Messina powers for setting up a common market themselves. Their view is that during the ten to fifteen years it would take to achieve the common market, much of the progress of recent years in reducing discrimination in Western Europe would be undone. This would aggravate protectionist tendencies and regionalism in other parts of the world. The United Kingdom Government believe the common market would tend to be a regional discriminatory bloc in conflict with the principles of freer trade and payments towards which Commonwealth countries and OEEC members have been working. In their view the political cohesion of Western Europe would be damaged rather than served by the division between the six and the rest of Europe; this would be further emphasized by the consequent weakening of the OEEC and NATO.

Preliminary Canadian Views

7. The comments which follow have been prepared in consultation with the other interested Departments and the Bank of Canada. They should, however, be regarded as preliminary; adequate information which would permit the Canadian Government to form any final judgment as to the merits of the common market proposal is not yet available. The six foreign ministers have so far given no more than a preliminary blessing to their experts' proposals. We have, however, had serious reservations about the discriminatory features of other trade and payments arrangements such as the European Payments Union and the OEEC Intra-European Trade Liberalization Plan. In its discriminatory aspects the common market arrangement would seem to differ only in degree from these other regional arrangements. The common market as now envisaged would put on a permanent basis (although among a smaller group of countries) the kind of discrimination against us and the rest of the world that the OEEC countries have been applying on a supposedly temporary and transitional basis. While we would share many of the United Kingdom's doubts about the common market proposals, one thing that would not give us the same concern would be their probable weakening effect on the OEEC. We would have the same kind of fears about the continuation on a permanent basis of discriminatory arrangements under the aegis of OEEC as we and the United Kingdom have about the common market proposals. (This does not of course mean that we do not recognize a value in OEEC as a European consultative and advisory body in economic affairs).

8. It can be argued that a full customs union would not be open to the same objections as a regional discriminatory arrangement; that it would result in better use of resources within the group of countries concerned; and that it would therefore be a strengthening factor in Western Europe. Whether it would have these results would depend on a number of unknown factors, particularly the nature and levels of the tariffs the six countries would apply to imports from nom-members.[8] The experts recommended the elimination of internal barriers without raising the average of the tariffs against outside countries. (This is a necessary condition to secure GATT consent). But during the long period of transition, there is little prospect of any tariffs against outside countries being lowered, and we would expect the effect of the steadily increasing degree of discrimination to be a dividing influence in Western Europe. Nor, on present evidence, could we count on seeing any important improvement in economic efficiency during this period.[9] Finally it seems to us unlikely that the project would ever result in a full customs union partly, for example, because of the difficulties which France, for one, would face in removing its tariffs against the other five, even in the lengthy stages envisaged. What would remain, if events followed this course, would be a discriminatory preferential arrangement between a limited number of European countries — a rather shaky economic foundation on which to try to build the political strength of Western Europe as a whole.[10]

9. We would not, however, think it wise to express these doubts to the six Messina powers, in the near future at any rate. It is most unlikely that this would do any good, and very likely that it might be misunderstood; the United Kingdom's representations have been strongly resented. If the project were to fail, we would be blamed. If it is likely to go ahead anyway, we might as well avoid incurring the displeasure of the Six to no purpose.[11]

10. You will have seen a telegram from Mr. Robertson (copy attached for convenience of reference) expressing the hope that when the time comes our attitude toward the common market proposals will be "reasonably constructive" and making some suggestions as to the kind of arrangements that would be least likely to jeopardize our trading interests. Sir Anthony Eden may be aware of Mr. Robertson's views. We are rather doubtful whether the sector-by-sector approach he favours would be acceptable to the Six; moreover, if this approach were followed it could be expected that the most difficult sectors, such as agriculture, would be left until the last. We are, however, giving fuller consideration to these suggestions in consultation with other interested Departments and the Bank of Canada.

11. In any discussion of the common market with Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Lloyd, you might wish to indicate:

(a) that we are naturally very interested in the political possibilities which the Messina powers see in closer economic association between their countries;

(b) that we share some of the doubts which the United Kingdom has expressed concerning the economic implications of the common market proposals;

(c) that being less directly concerned than the United Kingdom we have not felt as free to express misgivings about this particular project although we have always taken every opportunity to make known our strong preference for multilateral as opposed to regional trade and payments arrangements;

(d) that we are less inclined that the United Kingdom to boost OEEC as a practical alternative to the customs union if this is likely to imply that OEEC's transitional discriminatory arrangements might be put on a permanent basis;

(e) that in the circumstances we do not propose to take much part in the debate on the merits of the Messina proposals, although we shall, of course, continue to advocate non-discriminatory commercial policies in keeping with GATT and Fund principles; and

(f) that we could concur in the following extract from the Eden-Eisenhower statement:

> "In the economic field we recognize the contribution which the O.E.E.C. (Organization for European Economic Cooperation) makes to the stability of Europe. Within the framework of the Atlantic community, and with regard to its broader interests, we support further progress on the continent toward unity, both political and economic."[12]

12. Finally, you might consider whether to suggest that we would really prefer the United Kingdom not to put forward the Commonwealth connection, as such, as a main reason for their inability to participate in the proposed common market. We can readily understand that the special trading relationship between the United Kingdom and the rest of the Sterling Area might be regarded as an obstacle (although probably not as serious a one as the United Kingdom's own national commercial interests); but this is not of direct concern to the non-sterling member of the Commonwealth. We can also understand that in the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand any drastic change in the British preferential tariff might be politically unpopular, but I do not think we would regard this preferential tariff system as quite such an important factor in the economic or political strength of the Commonwealth. It probably does no good to the attitude of the Messina countries towards the Commonwealth to have it brought into the argument without a fuller explanation of what is meant.[13]

13. In the above statement of our tentative point of view towards a common market for the Messina powers, we have emphasized the economic difficulties because our judgment is that they are sufficiently formidable to vitiate the political advantages by preventing the completion of the customs union as at present planned. From our point of view a "half-way house" customs union (involving old-fashioned discrimination in a different guise) would be worse than none at all. We fully appreciate, however, both the sincerity and the validity of the political case made by such European Ministers as Mr. Spaak. We do not seriously question that their political objectives might be assisted if a broad and effective customs union were to be achieved. In the circumstances it would seem most becoming for Canada to refrain from volunteering comments at present on this particular project.[14]

DESPATCH 273 London, February 15, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

I have now had an opportunity of studying the very interesting contributions which have been made to the discussion of this subject by a number of our missions. They raise some points of substance on which I should like to comment further.

2. We all agree that a common market in Western Europe could develop into a protectionist continental area. At the same time it is worth remembering that the common market initiative has been launched by countries which have, on the whole, followed liberal trade policies and which stand little to gain and much to lose from a closed and discriminatory economic system in Western Europe. These countries, notably Belgium and the Netherlands, would not welcome a free trade area in which internal re-export would require elaborate administrative controls nor do they seek a customs union in which they would be obligated to raise their external tariff barrier to any significant degree. I have the impression, therefore, that they would not regard as unhelpful any pressure which sympathetic outsiders might exert to bring the common market proposals into line with the objective of a multilateral system of trade and payments. This impression, incidentally, has been confirmed by discussions which we have had with the Dutch here and I am glad to see it borne out in Mr. Stone's general analysis of the Dutch position (despatch No. 57 of February 1† from The Hague).

3. Our main apprehension about the potentially protectionist direction in which a common market might drift stems, I take it, from the position of the French. For it is clear that, unless French prices can be brought into line with world prices, the French role in the common market is unlikely to be more constructive than it has been in the O.E.E.C. It would be wrong, on the other hand, to suppose that all the cards are in the hands of the French. A common market in which the French did not participate would pose as many difficulties for France as it would for the other members of the scheme. Moreover, the Government at present in power in France is one which appears to be genuinely committed to the principle of further integration in Europe and one which is, therefore, less likely to regard French participation in a common market as a reluctant bargaining counter for an integrated European development plan for nuclear energy.

4. Our O.E.E.C. Delegation is no doubt right in supposing that within the common market there would be as many protective forces as there would be forces pulling the other way. I think, however, that there are two limiting factors to this. First, there is likely sooner or later to be a downward pressure on external tariffs in the six countries. If, for example, raw materials and semi-manufactures entered Germany under a lower tariff than France, it is obvious that the cost of the finished product would give a relative advantage to the German producer. Even supposing that there were internal controls over the re-export of the raw materials or semi-manufactures originally imported into the common market area, these controls could not apply to the finished product since this would explicitly contravene the interpretation of a free trade area under Article XXIV(8)(b) of the G.A.T.T. This being so, we might expect the French producer to see to it that he gets his raw materials at prices which do not place him at a disadvantage over his German competitor.

5. The second limiting factor lies in the objectives of the common market itself. For one of these objectives is surely to improve economic efficiency and to rationalize the use of Europe's resources. In my previous message I outlined a scheme for the treatment of bulky commodities which, I thought, would make it possible for the countries of the common market to make a relatively easy start toward dismantling internal tariffs. I assumed that this could be done without the concomitant necessity of imposing internal re-export controls. Mr. Wilgress has now pointed out that the external tariff disparity between, say, France and the Benelux countries is of such magnitude that re-export controls would probably continue to be required in this case to protect the interests of the French. Even supposing, however, that the external tariff wall were identical in all the common market countries, it is still conceivable that the French would argue that unimpeded internal movement would place a port like Antwerp at a competitive advantage over, say, Le Havre in that it would be cheaper to ship bulky goods to the industrial region of Northern France through Antwerp. It is my view that such an argument could not be publicly made without showing up the common market scheme as something which fails to conform with the criteria on which the Contracting Parties to the G.A.T.T. are bound to judge any proposals put up to them.

6. It is reasonable to suppose, in any case, that the Contracting Parties will not find their hands unduly tied when they come to consider the common market proposals, of the six countries. Neither the shape of these proposals, once the conflicting views of the participating countries have been resolved, nor the time limit stipulated for putting them into practice are likely to conform too closely with the terms of Article XXIV. In these circumstances it might be possible for the Contracting Parties to make their waiver subject to a set of special conditions, if necessary under Article XXV(5).

7. I suggested in my previous message that as one of these special conditions the six countries might be asked to cut their tariffs on a percentage basis with a view to bringing them into closer alignment and, incidentally, co-ordinating the common market with other moves which are being made on a world basis to eliminate trade barriers. In making this suggestion I did not have in mind anything in the nature of a penalty clause nor did I intend to imply that there was much prospect of such a condition being acceptable to the six countries without qualification. The fact is, however, that to some of the common market countries the idea that they would have to raise their tariffs so that others might be able to lower theirs is repugnant. These countries would much rather see the common external fence adjusted to something lower than the present average level. It probably would, as I suggested, be necessary for countries outside the common market to participate in such a tariff reduction exercise if it is to command adequate support among the common market countries as a group. In view of the strong support which the United States is evidently prepared to give to the common market initiative on political grounds, I think that it would be premature to exclude the possibility of some United States contribution to a solution along these lines. Such a contribution could be put to Congress as being in the interest of political consolidation in Europe and as a further and reciprocal step toward the removal of trade barriers on a multilateral basis. The actual procedure which I envisaged the tariff reduction might take is one for which the present Administration's revision of the Trade Agreements Act offers at least a precedent in principle.

8. Our O.E.E.C. Delegation mentions the abolition of all remaining quantitative restrictions as an alternative price which we might set for a waiver under the G.A.T.T. I must admit that my own proposals were based on the assumption that, by the time the common market had come into being, we would be dealing with a convertible Europe and one in which quantitative restrictions had been substantially eliminated. That is why I placed what might have seemed to you undue emphasis on the question of tariffs. The survival of quantitative restrictions would, of course, pose an entirely different problem and one which, in my view, it would be exceedingly difficult for a market of this size and importance to tackle in the terms of Article XXIV of the G.A.T.T.

9. There remains the question of whether a free trade area or a customs union would offer a greater potential threat to Canadian trade with the common market area and to the broader objectives of Canadian commercial policy. As Mr. Wilgress has pointed out the Canadian economy is, to a substantial degree, complementary to the economies of the countries which are likely to be associated in the common market. Where we compete with the products of participating countries we would, in any case, have to contend with duty-free entry privileges for such products in each of the other countries of the common market, whether the decision eventually reached is to establish a free trade area or a customs union.

10. The next consideration is how a free trade area or a customs union, respectively, would affect our trading position in relation to imports into the common market from other non-participating countries. Here the odds are even and I agree with our O.E.E.C. Delegation that our position would depend largely on "the relative levels of the tariffs on our main exports" as they emerged from the tariff alignment that is implicit in the customs union proposals. It is, however, conceivable that under the type of alignment formula envisaged under Article XXIV of the G.A.T.T. we might find that upward adjustments in the tariff of markets like the Benelux might be more than offset by the greater opportunities afforded to Canadian trade through a reduction in the tariff of some potentially large markets like France and Germany.

11. As I see it, however, the decisive consideration from our point of view would be whether a free trade area or a customs union is more likely to contribute to that wider measure of freedom in international exchanges which is a basic objective of Canadian policy. In my own view, a free trade area offers a better prospect in that direction. On the purely practical plane, there is a danger that the tendency, in devising a common external tariff fence under a customs union, will be to increase tariffs on items that are sensitive to competition from outside the common market and to reduce tariffs on items which are less sensitive to such competition. Beyond this, however, a common tariff fence is bound to prove much less amenable to reduction, negotiated or otherwise, than the tariffs of the individual common market countries and it would eliminate the automatic downward pressure on tariffs which, in my view, a free trade area arrangement is likely to exert on the participating countries with a view to securing their competitive position in relation to that of their partners in the common market.

12. There is one further consideration which I should like to put forward in favour of the free trade area and which has to do with the position of the United Kingdom. I do not wish to suggest that this position has yet undergone any change or that anything in the nature of an "agonizing reappraisal" is in prospect. Nevertheless, the position of this country in relation to the common market poses a number of difficult problems by no means all of which have been thought through. The basic problem, of course, is how to reconcile the United Kingdom interest in safeguarding its access to the European market on equal terms with the continuation of some form of Commonwealth preferences. A free trade area arrangement is at least one in which the United Kingdom could conceivably participate without abandoning its preferential commitments altogether. I should think that, on political as well as economic grounds, most of the countries in the common market would be prepared to co-operate in working out a formula which would enable the United Kingdom to associate itself with their common effort. There is therefore much to be said, in my view, for trying to find an approach to the common market which would not close the door to such participation from the outset.

PERSONAL AND SECRET Paris, February 23, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson],

I am much obliged to you for your personal and secret letter of February 9† and I thank you for enclosing copies of the letters you have exchanged with Mr. Spaak on the subject of Western European integration.

I have already given my views on the economic aspects of the European common market proposal. The same mail that brought your letter also brought a copy of Mr. Léger's memorandum of February 3rd, which he prepared for your talks with Sir Anthony Eden and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd. I think that his memorandum sets out the position extremely well and I agree with nearly all its conclusions. Like the views I have expressed, it stresses the economic objections, whereas Mr. Spaak's letter to you deals with the political arguments in favour of pressing on with the Messina initiative. In this letter, therefore, I shall confine myself to the political side of the question.

We can share fully Mr. Spaak's concern about the way in which the political situation of Europe is evolving. He is in a better position than anyone else to speak with authority on this subject and, therefore, we can accept without question his diagnosis of the present situation. It is when Mr. Spaak prescribes remedies by proposing to press on actively with the common market proposal that I fear we must part company with him on political as well as on economic grounds.

First of all, I would like to say that, if a further move is to be made in the direction of Western European integration, the most promising field is in that of nuclear power. It does make sense for the European countries to combine in the setting up of a single agency to develop this entirely new industry. The capital required is so enormous that it is only sensible for countries to undertake a joint effort. Their combined efforts would be much more effective than if each nation were to seek to develop nuclear power solely on the basis of its own resources. On the other hand, the same arguments would apply to a wider field of cooperation than that of the six Messina countries. It does seem a pity that by stressing supranational features the cooperation of the Scandinavians has been excluded, not to mention the cooperation of the United Kingdom. We also see that even in this promising field of nuclear power, the forces of nationalism are giving rise to grave doubts in some of the Messina countries. Instead, therefore, of making for European unity, the first effects of the proposal have been to make, to a certain degree, for disunity.

If this has happened in relation to the relatively promising nuclear power proposal, we can readily see the danger of disunity arising out of the much less promising common market proposal. Anyone acquainted with the conflicting vested interests among the six countries will realize that the efforts to bring about a common market are likely to result in some half-way house which, by introducing a new and provocative form of discrimination, will increase the stresses and strains within Western Europe and within the Atlantic Community generally. Moreover, before the proposal can be ratified by their parliaments we are bound to see arising in each of the six countries serious internal conflicts, embitterment and recriminations. The vested interests adversely affected will not lightly yield the gains they have derived from protectionism and national feeling will be inflamed at the threatened subordination of national interests to the wider interests of "Little Europe".

Mr. Spaak's main argument is based on the need of tying Germany to Western Europe in case a resurgence in German nationalism would lead the Germans to seek a rapprochement with the Russians. But, does he really think that tying up Germany in this way would really prevent resurgent German nationalism from seeking a rapprochement with the Soviet Union if the Germans became convinced that this was the only way to reunify Germany and to assure German energy of wider outlets for economic expansion? The only safeguard against the Germans running amok in this way is trust in their good sense to see where their real interests lie.

The main difficulty about all these schemes for European integration is that they underestimate the strength of national feeling in the European countries, the diversities in the historical development of each country and the strongly entrenched vested interests in national institutions and in national protectionism.

We saw what happened to the EDC proposal when French nationalism reacted so strongly to the fear that the French Army would lose its identity as a national institution. Yet EDC offered a solution to France against the revival of German militarism. We wasted four precious years over this proposal before the conclusion was reached that the correct solution was not a European but an Atlantic one. We can see clearly now that WEU was nothing more than a temporary European bridge across which Germany could enter the Atlantic Community. My fear, therefore, about the Messina initiative is that it will lead once more to a great deal of wasted effort and frustration before we again arrive at an Atlantic rather than a purely European solution.

I can detect in Mr. Spaak's reply a vestige of the old Third Force idea. This becomes clear from his penultimate paragraph when he writes that "if, on the contrary, a certain equilibrium could be reached between the United States of America and the United States of Europe, the dialogue to give real effect to Article 2 could usefully be begun". This is a fine ideal but, given the strength of national feelings in Europe, it is one that is incapable of realization. Nor would the United States of Europe necessarily be on a par with the United States of America. The world as it has emerged from World War II is a world dominated by two super powers each of which has a vast expanse of territory and great resources. The conditions simply do not exist in Europe for creating a third such super power. The alternative facing other nations is to align themselves with one or other of the two super powers. Alignment with the Soviet Union means complete subjection. I do not believe that the Germans will ever take this road. Alignment with the United States means the continued possibility for the highly individualized nations to live in freedom under the protection of American power. This is the real meaning of the Atlantic Community.

Because Western Europe is in such an exposed position it should become obvious to the Europeans where their true interests lie. Such a realization, however, can be dangerously obscured if we continue to pursue the myth of European integration with all the wasted effort and frustration that this involves.

In conclusion, I wish to express the hope that you will be afforded the opportunity of reading the article entitled "Myth and Reality in European Integration" which Lincoln Gordon contributed to a recent issue of the Yale Review.[15] In this article he stresses that the prime need for Western Europe (and for the Atlantic Community) is not tighter integration but ever closer international cooperation.

Yours sincerely,

DANA [WILGRESS]

PERSONAL AND SECRET London, February 23, 1956

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

Thanks for letting me see copies of the correspondence with Spaak. You drew a very interesting letter from him.

When you come to write to him again, you might consider putting up to him an idea which, if he wished to make it his own, might have quite useful political and economic implications. From thinking about the various relationships which exist between this country and the European common market, I became interested in the relationship that is presently taking shape between the United Kingdom and the European Coal and Steel Community. Politically an accommodation has been reached, a treaty has been signed, and the Coal and Steel Community have established a permanent diplomatic mission in London to facilitate contacts and cooperation between the United Kingdom and the Community. People on both sides are disposed to congratulate themselves on having worked out a tolerable modus vivendi. I doubt myself whether this confidence is well placed. So long as both coal and steel are in very short supply, there is no particular difficulty or conflict between the economic interests of the United Kingdom and the Community. The domestic demand in this country for both coal and steel is so high that neither United Kingdom industry nor the government appear to have noticed the effect on their export position, say, in a market like Holland, of the removal between the countries of the Community of their import duties on coal and steel. I do not think they will be so complacent about their relations with the Coal and Steel Community when it moves into its second phase, that of organizing a common customs tariff around the free trade area it is creating. Such a tariff, even though kept down below the average of current tariffs by the importing interest of Holland, Italy and perhaps Belgium, is bound to put United Kingdom exports of iron and steel to the European market at an increasing disadvantage. As soon as productive capacity begins to overtake demand, this sense of disadvantage seems to me bound to make itself felt.

Against this situation which seems to be developing, I was surprised to find out (from Kohnstamm, the acting representative in London of the Coal and Steel Community) that the Community's charter does not at present give it power to make a collective trade arrangement with countries not members of the Community. This means that the United Kingdom and Sweden, to take two countries that might conceivably be prepared to enter into a common market for coal and steel without being willing to join the Coal and Steel Community as such, would be unable to enter into agreement with the Community for the reciprocal free entry of coal and steel products. Any such trade agreement would require the individual approval, and would therefore be subject to the individual veto, of each of the six countries in the Community. Some members of the Community might have quite a lively interest in such an extension of the common market to include the United Kingdom and Sweden. Others would have a definite protectionist interest in preventing such an extension.

I think it would be a constructive measure, and one that could most appropriately come from a leading member of the Coal and Steel Community, to propose that the Community itself should be given authority to negotiate agreements with other countries for the free entry into those countries of the range of commodities covered by the Coal and Steel Agreement, in return for granting reciprocal free entry of the same range of products into the countries of the common market. To give the Community this supra-national power to make a collective trade agreement would further strengthen the political development of the Community as a European institution, and would at the same time give it an opportunity to take the lead in proposing permanent measures of economic cooperation with other countries which look with sympathy on the general objectives of the Community, share its partners' interest in creating wider and freer markets for iron and steel, and which are, for reasons which appear to be generally accepted, unwilling to accept organic membership of the Community itself.

It seems to me that this is an approach which should commend itself to M. Spaak, as well as to MM. Mollet and Mendes-France, because it would provide an opportunity of associating the United Kingdom, perhaps all the Scandinavian countries, and perhaps Austria, with what seems to be the most firmly-based of the new European institutions. By the same token, such an external extension of the European common market for coal and steel would moderate pro tanto the relative weight and importance of the German steel industry within the general European coal and steel complex.

Yours sincerely,

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION—A DRAFT REPLY TO MR. SPAAK'S LETTER

Yesterday afternoon we had a very interesting and useful session with Mr. Bryce, Mr. Rasminsky, Mr. Plumptre, Mr. Isbister, and officials of our own Department, discussing Western European integration in general and in particular the draft statements Mr. Wilgress will make at the O.E.E.C. Ministerial Council next week. Now that we have achieved a greater meeting of minds on this question with other Departments — and we shall be submitting to you shortly a paper on this subject — you might like to consider a reply to Mr. Spaak's letter. A draft is attached in the form of a telegram to Mr. Hébert. It is not perhaps as positive as we ourselves might wish, but it would, I think, carry the judgment of all concerned at the official level.

2. I think it might be a nice gesture to follow up your reply by asking Mr. Hébert to give Mr. Spaak advance copies of the statements Mr. Wilgress will make at the O.E.E.C. Ministerial Council next Monday and Tuesday on the common market and on EURATOM.[16] Do you agree?[17]

3. If you approve, we might also circulate to the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney copies of your exchange of letters with Mr. Spaak.[18]

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION

Please give Mr. Spaak the following reply to his personal and confidential letter of January 27. Text begins:

"My Dear Spaak:

I am most grateful to you for the force and frankness with which you explained, in your letter of January 27, your reasons for seeking closer integration among the Messina powers. I shall certainly respect the personal and confidential character of our correspondence; and I write to you on the same basis. Thanks to your letter, I now feel that I have a clearer understanding of your political aims and motivations; I must say that you present an extremely thought provoking case.

As far as the political aims of the Messina powers are concerned we are in complete agreement. As you know, our worries on economic grounds have been based chiefly on the premise that the movement towards a common market might be begun but might not be successfully completed — in which case the last state might well be worse than the first, from the point of view not simply of the other members of the North Atlantic Community, but of the six participants themselves. But that is primarily your concern rather than ours; and I know that you and your colleagues are fully alive to the need to keep Messina developments within the limits of the principles of the GATT.

Hébert will already have shown you a summary of our discussions with Sir Anthony Eden and Selwyn Lloyd. I gained the impression from our talks in Ottawa that the United Kingdom Ministers are no longer taking quite such an unfavourable view, even of the common market, as had been indicated by earlier United Kingdom statements in O.E.E.C. and elsewhere towards the end of last year. The reference in the Washington declaration to support for any 'further progress on the continent toward unity, both political and economic' may also be evidence of some moderating of their earlier position. (As far as Canada is concerned, we could, of course, fully subscribe to this declaration).

I hope the O.E.E.C. ministerial meeting next week will not make any new difficulties for you. Certainly, anything which Mr. Wilgress may say is not intended to do so, and I hope you will find his brief intervention helpful. (Hébert will be giving you these texts as soon as possible) as in previous Canadian statements on the subject he will indicate our hope that the common market, if it is realized, will mean from the beginning of the process a general lowering rather than raising of external tariffs around the customs union area. I am sure that this suggestion is in accordance with your own objectives and those particularly of your Benelux colleagues.

As concrete planning on Euratom and the common market may be further advanced by spring, I shall look forward to continuing our 'conversation' at the ministerial meeting of the NATO Council in May, as you have suggested.

Again my best thanks and warm personal regards,

Yours sincerely, L.B. Pearson

Text ends.

When possible please give Spaak texts of statements Mr. Wilgress will make in O.E.E.C. Council February 27-28. These are being repeated to you separately.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL — EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

We have made a few alterations in the draft statement you proposed you might make in the Council discussion of the European common market.

2. The following is the revised text you might use. Begins:

Since the Messina conference last June the Canadian Government has followed with close interest the development of ideas relating to the formation by the six interested countries of a European common market. We would of course agree in principle with any arrangement which strengthens the political bonds within Western Europe, and with any initiative which contributes to the prosperity and economic strength of this important area of the world by lowering trade barriers. The Secretary General has, however, drawn attention to the problems of transition to a common market; it is essentially a long term operation, and the only feasible method of achieving it is by the progressive reduction of obstacles to trade between participating countries. This transitional phase raises problems not only for the OEEC, but also for the wider trading area of the Western world. It is important to ensure that its effects within Europe are not divisive and that it will not be taken as a substitute for the general movement in which we are all associated towards a multilateral system of world trade and payments. The logic which argues in favour of broadening the market of the six countries could scarcely fail to recognize the even larger benefits in the reduction of trade barriers on a still wider basis.

With this in mind, the Canadian Government would assume that the common market proposals would as a minimum respect fully the principles relating to such arrangements which are embodied in the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and would aim at reducing and not increasing the obstacles to trade between the participants and the rest of the world.

We welcome the affirmation contained in the communiqué of the ministerial meeting in Brussels on February 12 that the policy of the governments concerned would not be based on an autarchic system, but we would stress the importance of considering as well the possible influence of their plans on other trading areas. We would suggest that care must be taken to ensure that the example set in Europe does not have unfortunate repercussions elsewhere — a danger which would be enhanced if the movement once started were to come to a halt short of the final goal of a common market. The effect could be to stimulate the creation of other preferential groupings with results that the six countries themselves would recognize as contrary to their interests and those of the free world as a whole.

I would emphasize that the Canadian Government is fully in sympathy with the political objectives of the Messina powers, consistent as they are with the fuller development and strengthening of the North Atlantic community. In examining the common market proposals we will have these objectives very much in mind, as well as the importance of ensuring that any plans which result from these proposals should be so designed that they may reasonably be expected to assist the achievement of these objectives. Ends.

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION

I attach a draft memorandum on this subject, based on the discussion at the meeting which you chaired on February 22. I also attach a copy of a letter† to the other Departments represented at that meeting, in which we have asked for their views on the draft.

2. It is perhaps unusual to ask your views on a memorandum addressed to yourself while it is still in draft form. Of course your comments will govern the final form of the memorandum. On the other hand it seemed to me wise, and I understand that you share this view, that the paper should not go as a memorandum for the Minister. If it were to do so either his comments or his failure to comment would tend to establish a position which it would be premature to define as Government policy. It was my thought, therefore, that (when the paper has been revised to take account of comments from those represented at the meeting) you might submit to the Minister for signature a non-committal letter sending the paper to the Missions concerned. In this way the paper could be brought to his attention, and to the Missions, in a manner which would not in any way commit the Minister either for or against the views expressed.

3. Would you approve this procedure?[19] on February 22. The specific occasion for convoking that meeting, you will recall, was the need to decide upon the instructions to be sent to Mr. Wilgress for the forthcoming OEEC Ministerial Meeting, at which cooperation in atomic energy development and the proposed common market would be under discussion. While it was not considered that the preparation of these instructions would be particularly difficult, it was believed that their approval would afford an opportunity for a general exchange of views on problems relating to European integration. The meeting was attended by officials of the Departments of Finance and of Trade and Commerce, representatives of the Bank of Canada and of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and officers of European, Defence Liaison (1) and Economic Divisions.

2. It was generally accepted that the present situation in western Europe was such as to cause serious concern. The risk of Germany slipping away from the West after Adenauer's disappearance was very real, while in France and perhaps elsewhere there was the danger that Popular Front or neutralist governments might take over unless the political situation could be stabilized and set in order. Any of these developments would, of course, strike at vital points in the Atlantic alliance and would gravely, perhaps disastrously, compromise the resistance of western Europe to Communist domination. The economic difficulties of some European countries, and the maintenance of serious restrictions on their trade with each other and with the rest of the world were also an important element of weakness. France in particular was still denying its economy access to the cheapest sources of supply thereby fostering uneconomical high-cost production. The Federal Republic of Germany, deprived at present of traditional outlets to the east, smarting from the deeply-felt pangs of separation, and dependent upon a substantial level of foreign trade for her well-being, might be increasingly tempted by Soviet offers to resolve these difficulties if only she would break away from the western connection. It was difficult to see how a significant economic improvement could be attained unless the United States were to take a major initiative, in the direction of a more liberal trade policy, and this she seemed at present unable to do for domestic reasons and particularly in an election year.

3. The situation therefore appeared both economically and politically to be one of mingled stagnation and disintegration, with the two main focal spots for the malaise in the two traditional rivals — France and Germany. The most hopeful means of halting the European drift toward chaos or breakdown would be a strong act of leadership on the part of the United States in such a form as to inspire new hope and purpose and at the same time to hold out real promise of material improvement. Tragically, the United States could not or would not achieve such a stroke at least for a time. Two questions therefore arose, and they were not independent: could Europe afford to wait until the United States resumed effective leadership, and could Europe take action on its own account which would stave off the crisis which appeared to be developing?

4. It was the general view of the meeting that the Messina initiatives should be assessed in some such perspective as that set out above. It was generally agreed that the primary Canadian interest was to see a halt in the downward trend and a positive movement toward increasing health and strength in western Europe. Such matters as Canadian commercial interests were not likely to be seriously affected as a direct consequence of the Messina initiatives, and in any case were of secondary importance in relation to the major problem of ensuring the survival of western Europe with which we were so closely and inevitably associated. Those who were skeptical about the soundness of the Messina proposals emphasized that they were thinking in terms, not of Canadian commercial interests, but of the true interests, as they saw them, of western Europe.

5. The Messina proposals, or more specifically the Euratom and common market proposals which were part of the product of the Messina initiative, were therefore examined in terms of their potential contribution to the survival of western Europe. It was accepted that effective cooperation among European countries in the development of atomic energy could only be beneficial, and that there could be no question of opposing Euratom as such. Any support for Euratom, however, should depend on its readiness to cooperate constructively, along the lines of the type of cooperation envisaged by the OEEC's working party, with the other countries of western Europe. It would be difficult, moreover, to support Euratom if it developed along lines which tended significantly to restrictionism, since for reasons indicated above such tendencies would impede rather than facilitate the solution of Europe's fundamental problems. Only in this way would Euratom serve to strengthen the economic base of western Europe and contribute to the unity and well-being of the whole.

6. The common market project raised greater problems. In the first place it would obviously be much more difficult of attainment; indeed a number of those present considered that the most that could be expected would be a limited reduction of the tariffs and quantitative restrictions within the group on the least sensitive items; whereas any real contribution to higher productivity would have required the exposing of the sensitive industries to the fresh air of competition. In this view a limited move of this kind might only distract attention from the need for a major forward movement. It was probable that in practice the common market plan would involve the establishment of a trading bloc fairly effectively insulated against the outside world and would thus both directly in itself and indirectly by its example impede or even tend to reverse the movement toward a freer world-wide multilateral trading system. Some officials thought this fear was borne out by experience under the European Payments Union and the related OEEC trade liberalization scheme, where the pace of the movement in the direction of freer trade with the rest of the world had often been held back to suit the circumstances of the weakest members. The view was expressed that in the event the common market would prove to be a facade and an illusion, and that the disappointment following its probable failure would do much more harm than the benefits, limited both economically and politically, which could be expected even if it were more successful than it was reasonable to expect.

7. On the other hand, it was suggested that there was now little or no other outlet available for those Europeans determined to work for reform than in plans directed towards integration, and these constructive forces needed a symbol and rallying point. The common market, whatever its practical defects might be, appeared capable of serving as that symbol. It might therefore attract support and generate effective action well beyond what could otherwise be expected of it. Moreover, the crisis appeared imminent and Europe could scarcely afford to wait; the point had almost been reached where any course, desperate though it might appear, would have to be seized if it offered the hope of binding Germany firmly to the West and of giving Europe a fresh start toward economic health and balance. It was not clear whether or not common market represented such a course.

8. It was the general conclusion of the meeting that Canada should not oppose European integration along Messina lines, although she might comment critically on particular proposals which appeared harmful or dangerous. The exact plans that would result from the Messina proposals were not yet known, and perhaps not yet clear even to their proponents. Bearing in mind the misgivings indicated above, it would be premature at this stage for Canada to give positive support to those proposals, although it was desirable to express sympathy and support for the aims professed. The eventual role of the United Kingdom in these developments was not yet clear, and it would be difficult at present to assess the implications of any particular course which that country might follow. The development of events should be followed very closely, and the position reviewed and reassessed from time to time. It might at some stage be desirable to seek a general discussion of these matters, presumably at a high level, with the United States. But if, as these plans developed, we were persuaded that the Messina initiative was a conscientious attempt, by Europeans who saw their situation as desperate, to work out a form of salvation for western Europe, we must give them our best wishes and hope for their success. In any case, to oppose their efforts, when we have no alternative action to propose, could probably do no good and might do much harm.

OEEC MINISTERIAL COUNCIL: EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

As we reported it had been agreed prior to the Ministerial Council that an opportunity would be afforded at the Ministerial Council for an exchange of views on the common market initiative of the six Messina countries. However, Mr. Macmillan decided that this exchange of views was not really necessary at this time and consequently no formal exchange of views took place. In private, however, the Messina ministers apparently gave assurances of their intention to cooperate fully with non-participating countries in the event that they should proceed with the formation of a common market.

2. Consequently we did not make the statement which you sent to us in your reference telegram. The United States Representative was also prepared to make a statement which, we were told by Shearer of their Permanent Delegation, would have indicated strong support of the common market. We wonder whether Mr. Macmillan heard about the United States statement before taking this item off the agenda.

3. Beyen (Netherlands), during the discussion on the programme of work, referred to the common market proposal. He said the Six wanted to go further than the OEEC but they never intended to hamper the liberalisation efforts of OEEC member countries nor did they wish to be an exclusive or protectionist group. On the contrary, they would welcome outside countries participating. He said the six countries felt they were striving for the strengthening of Europe. They did not wish to disrupt the work of OEEC which they considered a valuable instrument. During the discussion on tariffs, he said that if the OEEC endeavours resulted in reducing tariffs, the six countries would only feel proud and happy because they might have provided a stimulant. Following up these remarks he said that all Messina countries had trade and other relations outside the group and would not be opposed to looking into the problem which their efforts, if they were successful, would create not only for non-participating countries but for their own governments in their relations with non-participating countries. The problem of the relationship was just as much a concern to the Six as it was to non-participating countries.

4. Petitpierre (Switzerland) also alluded to the common market when he proposed positive steps to reduce tariffs before the end of the GATT discussions in order to ensure the consolidation of the 90 percent stage. The common market initiative seemed to him to be an expression of the need for more reciprocity in intra-European trade relationships. He thought the common market, however, would not be without danger for the whole European economy and he pleaded for immediate progress by all OEEC countries on an MFN basis presumably with a view to forestalling a common market initiative.

5. No other ministers referred to the common market specifically. The debate on the common market in OEEC has thus been postponed probably until the six countries have further developed their project. In the meantime, the statement of Mr. Beyen is at least encouraging.

Note du chef de la Direction économique pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET [Ottawa], March 16, 1956

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION

You asked for my comments on the attached personal letters to the Minister dated February 23, from Mr. Robertson and Mr. Wilgress, on European integration.

2. Mr. Robertson puts forward the thought that the Coal and Steel Community should have authority to negotiate reciprocal agreements with non-member countries for the free movement of coal and steel products in both directions. The economic effect of this would be about the same as would be the case if such non-member countries were to join the Community. Mr. Robertson's idea is intended to apply to those countries which are unwilling to accept organic membership of the Community itself.

3. If I remember rightly the United Kingdom Government, about two years ago, was seriously considering just such a reciprocal arrangement for steel but not for coal. I thought it was largely because of opposition within the United Kingdom steel industry that the United Kingdom Government abandoned this idea, and instead entered into the present not very far-reaching arrangement. I am not sure that they are really likely to go back to their earlier idea; I suppose they might, however, in the somewhat different supply and demand situation Mr. Robertson envisages. Canada was consulted at that time about the possibility of the U.K. in effect entering the common market for steel, and we raised no objection. I doubt that our commercial interests (in terms of either markets or sources of supplies) would suffer significantly from any such arrangement between the Community and other western European countries. There would be some GATT technicalities to overcome, but these would probably not be insuperable.

4. I need hardly say that I am in full agreement with most of what Mr. Wilgress says in his letter. I am not competent to judge his assessment of what the Germans in their own interest are likely to do. They have not always acted in their own real interest in the past, but I am very doubtful whether the common market could or would restrain them from seeking a rapprochement with the USSR if that notion were to take firm root. There seems to me no prospect that the approach to a common market will go far enough to bring about an effective customs union and have any really constructive effect on the structure of the economies of the six members. This is why I find it hard to accept the idea that there can be a political interest working in one direction and an economic interest pointing the opposite way. We are agreed that certain political aims are desirable; the proposal is that we should try to attain them by using an instrument which happens to be economic in character; my view and that of numerous other "economists" is that this instrument will break in our (or the Europeans') hands, and that we shall all then be worse off than before, in political as well as economic terms.

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

We have spoken a couple of times on the phone about your departmental record of the meeting on European integration which took place last month, and which you sent over under covering letter of February 27. I am sorry that I have been unable until now to put my comments down on paper.

I think the draft memorandum is an accurate enough account of what was said at the meeting, though it may convey the impression of a general consensus being reached on some matters on which the only views expressed were those of the political officers of your department. I have in mind particularly paragraphs 2 and 3 which emphasize the political necessity for something like Messina and describes the dangers of economic disintegration of Europe in quite strong terms. These things were said all right, but I don't think they were generally endorsed. At any rate, for my part, I do not feel I have the basis for an independent opinion on the political question; and I see little sign of Western Europe's "mingled stagnation and disintegration", economically, as described in paragraph 3, nor of the "crisis" which is stated in paragraph 7 to appear "imminent" and which is thought to justify any course, however desperate, to bind Germany to the West. I suspect that these points (at least the economic ones) are rather highly pitched in the draft memorandum.

The general conclusion on Messina reached in paragraph 3[21] seems to me, in essence, to be right, but I would not put it in quite the same way as the memorandum does. We really do not have enough information about the concrete steps which the Messina powers would take to be able to appraise their economic effects. We should certainly not oppose arrangements among European countries which will strengthen them economically and which will have desirable political consequences. We should not, on principle, be opposed to a customs union among the 6 countries, and indeed since this is provided for in GATT, subject to certain conditions, we are not entitled to oppose in principle. At the same time we must not lose sight of the possible dangers and pitfalls in the Messina idea and should, as the memorandum says, comment critically on particular proposals that seem harmful and dangerous. There are, it seems to me, two main dangers. The first is that the Messina proposal is not really a starter — that the countries concerned will, when it gets down to cases, not be willing to do away with tariffs and trade restrictions on trade with each other. The history of Benelux and the proposed Italo-French customs union supports this suspicion. Apart from the political let-down which would result when this became apparent, the economic risk here is that by proceeding only part way, the 6 European countries would accomplish little more than a new discriminatory regional grouping which did little or nothing for them economically while it injured the position of outside countries (including Canada) and at the same time slowed up the movement towards liberalizing trade and payments arrangements on a broad world-wide basis. The second main danger would appear to be that the European countries concerned could establish a true customs union only on the basis of tariff rates against the outside world considerably higher than those now in force in some of these countries.

8, I think. J.F. G[randy]

For these reasons, I would be inclined to word the general conclusion in paragraph 8 somewhat more cautiously than to say that "it would be premature at this stage for Canada to give positive support to these proposals". I think we could well express sympathy and support for the aims professed, but that until more details are available as to the concrete steps proposed our attitude should be one of benevolent but skeptical neutrality.

Yours sincerely,

L. RASMINSKY

Attention: Mr. A.E. Ritchie

Dear Sir:

I wish to thank you for sending me, in your letter of February 27, a draft memorandum on European integration. I have given it careful consideration.

On the whole, I consider the draft very good indeed. It reflects very well the sense of the interdepartmental meeting which considered the problem of European integration. There are, however, two points upon which I would like to comment.

In paragraph 4 on page 3 of the draft it is stated that "such matters as Canadian commercial interests were not likely to be seriously affected as a direct consequence of the Messina initiatives, and in any case were of secondary importance in relation to the major problem of ensuring the survival of Western Europe with which we were so closely and inevitably associated". This sentence struck me as perhaps dismissing a little too lightly the possible consequences of the Messina proposals for particular exporters or groups of exporters. I would suggest that the following wording might reflect the position more accurately: "Some Canadian commercial interests might be adversely affected, at least in the short run. However, if the Messina proposals seemed capable of making a significant contribution to the survival of Western Europe, Canada should be prepared to make some sacrifice for this cause." The last sentence of the paragraph should, of course, remain.

In paragraph 8 on the bottom of page 5 the conclusion is reached that "it would be premature at this stage for Canada to give positive support to those proposals". This suggests that Canadian support is merely being withheld for the time being. It seems to me that it would be better to say "it would be unwise for Canada to give positive support to those proposals". The rest of the paragraph, as it stands, adequately covers the point that the matter is to be kept under constant review, and that if and when concrete plans are put forward which allay our fears concerning the beneficial results for Western Europe, we might then be prepared to give our support.

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION: COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

I am told that to all intents and purposes decision has been reached to associate UK with European common market by way of free trade area arrangement. This decision has been pressed by Thorneycroft and Macmillan and is expected to receive final endorsement as soon as time can be found for consideration by full Cabinet. This has been difficult in recent weeks because of Cabinet preoccupation with Suez crisis.

2. It is hoped that Cabinet approval of decision will be given before Commonwealth Finance Ministers meet in Washington later this month. In that case Macmillan would avail himself of opportunity to initiate consultations with his Commonwealth colleagues. It is also possible that Thorneycroft might go to Washington for this purpose. I understand that UK High Commissioners have already received message for communication to Commonwealth governments to which they are accredited to be used if and when Cabinet approval has been confirmed.

3. Terms of UK decision are that this country would be prepared to enter into consultations with Messina powers with a view to entering into free trade area arrangement which would exclude "food and feed". This exclusion was dictated by two considerations. First, Government do not feel they can abandon their commitments to British agriculture. Second, exclusion of agricultural commodities would protect bulk of preferences at present being granted to Commonwealth producers in UK market. While exclusion is categorical at this time, I was given impression that Government may be prepared to reconsider their position if they find Europeans unwilling to negotiate on this basis. On the other hand, it may well be, of course, that British position on exclusion of agriculture will play into hands of those Messina powers who have insisted all along that progress on removal of barriers to trade in agricultural commodities must be gradual and that agricultural sector should be last to be freed.

4. Government envisage consultations with Commonwealth governments almost as first step. This is because reactions of Commonwealth governments will carry considerable weight with Conservative Party and Labour Opposition. Although Labour Party spokesmen have strongly advocated British association with European common market in one form or another, it is felt that consultation with them is imperative, not only because proposed policy represents long-term commitment, but also because final position of Labour Party will have to take into account trade union reaction which might well be less enthusiastic. Consultations are also envisaged with Americans who, while favourably inclined to closer British ties with Europe on general policy grounds, might grow restive as time goes on. This could conceivably lead to American pressure for concessions in UK market to appease sectional interests in USA.

5. British decision, if and when confirmed by Cabinet, represents major policy shift. It was taken, I assume, partly on political grounds and partly because existence of a common market in Europe from which Britain was excluded posed an inescapable threat to British economy. Prospect of loss of some Australian preferences may well have precipitated decision. I am also inclined to think that Thorneycroft, among others, had in mind advantages which would result for domestic economy from increased competition.

6. To the extent that major policy shift is involved, I am a little surprised that no attempt has been made to prepare ground in Commonwealth countries. Preoccupation with Suez has, no doubt, overshadowed other issues in recent weeks and Government here may feel that there will be sufficient time for consultation on a policy that will not come to full fruition for a decade or more. Fact remains, however, that Australia and New Zealand have strong psychological attachment to Commonwealth preferential trading system, even if exclusion of agricultural commodities is likely to minimize effect on their trade with UK and that Canada, while less attached to preferences, will probably be more directly affected by free trade area arrangement between UK and European common market.

7. I assume that you will wish to prepare briefing for Mr. Harris before he goes to Washington. In particular you will wish to look at preferences we now enjoy in this market on non-agricultural products and some of which, I imagine, are more sensitive than others. On broader policy grounds, I understand that proposed arrangement with Europe is not intended either to replace or to inhibit progress with collective approach. In fact, Treasury think that free trade area arrangement with Europe spells beginning of end of use of quantitative restrictions as means of protecting balance of payments. These and many other ramifications of closer association with Europe are bound to be scrutinized very carefully before actual terms of association can be worked out.

8. NATO Mission please pass to Minister and Ritchie.

Note de la Direction économique pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Economic Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], September 19, 1956

THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE COMMON MARKET

Attached is a copy of a message which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has sent to the Minister of Finance. You will see that the United Kingdom's proposed decision to associate itself in a free trade area with the Common Market will be discussed at a meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in Washington which begins on September 29.

2. This proposed decision raises very sharply for Canada the question of where our long-term political and economic interests lie. Ever since the first steps were taken in 1935 to lessen the discriminatory features of the preferential system which reached its height in 1932 we have been working towards a trading system in which the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada could trade together on a basis of lower tariffs and a gradual withering away of the preferences which discriminated against the United States. I think part of the theory that has informed this policy has been the assumption that our ability to maintain a reasonable degree of national independence, as well as our economic interests, would best be served by a trading system in which we, the United Kingdom and the United States participated on fairly equal terms.

3. One question that arises, then, is to what extent the United Kingdom proposal would upset the balance of Canadian interests, i.e. how extensive a trade barrier would arise between the United Kingdom and Canada, and to what extent Canada would have to depend more on trade with the United States, and perhaps eventually to come under increased United States political influence.

4. It must be recognized that since the war there has in any case been a serious barrier facing Canadian exporters to the United Kingdom, the existence of the sterling-dollar imbalance and the quantitative import restrictions maintained by the United Kingdom against the dollar area. Some considerable progress has been made since 1952 in reducing these restrictions and putting some of them on a non-discriminatory basis. Although this progress has pretty well come to a halt we would have hoped that further steps would be taken as soon as the United Kingdom's balance of payments improved again. (In paragraph 7 the Chancellor indicates that this would remain the aim of the United Kingdom. It is, however, difficult to believe that progress in this field will not be held back by the association with the Common Market. The necessary tariff adjustments vis-à-vis Europe will be difficult enough for United Kingdom industries; it is doubtful whether they will have much tolerance left for the additional impact of the removal of restrictions against dollar imports.)

5. We have always had some hope that we could eventually re-enter the United Kingdom market for some of the exports which are now prohibited on balance of payments grounds. The present proposal, however, would set up permanent barriers against some of our exports, with effects on the Canadian economy which we cannot yet judge.

6. Some time ago the Department of Trade and Commerce began a study of the implications for Canadian exports of this kind of association. This has not been completed but is now being speeded up. In the meantime, one could hazard a few generalizations. In foods such as wheat our position would be unaffected. In raw materials which represent an important part of our exports we would be unlikely to suffer. In semi-processed items, which are also important, we would probably be seriously affected. A good example is industrial chemicals, where at the moment we are able to compete on equal terms with the United States and Germany, but could probably not expect to compete against Germany if the latter had free entry and we did not. A similar situation would prevail in most manufactures. In the latter we have very limited access to the United Kingdom market at present because of existing restrictions on dollar imports. We would have hoped, however, to participate more and more in the United Kingdom market in the future. To do so in the face of a United Kingdom tariff preference to Germany would be very difficult.

7. It is in just these fields (where we might eventually have built up a useful trade with the United Kingdom) that it is most difficult to make sales to the United States, partly because the United States tariff is highest on manufactured goods, and partly because of the economies of large scale production in the United States. We may therefore have to concentrate increasingly on the production and sale of raw materials and slightly processed materials instead of building up a more diversified trade.

8. While it seemed worth while to put down these initial reactions with respect to the possible implications for Canada of such a decision, I recognize that there are other important considerations to take into account, notably the implications for Western Europe. Clearly such a decision by the United Kingdom would add greatly to the strength of the movement towards economic integration, and might possibly steer it along slightly more liberal lines than we might otherwise have expected. At the same time the Canadian reaction cannot now be based solely upon a consideration of the advantages and disadvantages of a Common Market on the continent; it must also take into account the nature of our economic and possibly our political relationships with the United Kingdom and the United States.

9. It is expected in the Department of Finance that Mr. Harris will probably circulate to other Ministers concerned a draft statement he would propose to make in the meeting of Finance Ministers. The gist of this would probably be that this is such a momentous and interesting proposal that it is impossible (on ten days' notice) to say what the Canadian Government's reaction is until there has been an opportunity to study the ramifications of such a step on the part of the United Kingdom.

I am looking forward with pleasure, to the prospect of meeting you at the end of this month, at the Fund and Bank Meetings in Washington. There is a matter of importance to us which I want to discuss at the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers on 29th September, and on which I think it right to give you some prior notice.

2. There is we believe, much force in the widely held view that so long as Europe consists of a number of separate national economies, these cannot provide a large enough market to be a satisfactory base for modern industry, technically equipped and adequately developed to compete with the mass production potential of the United States of America and the U.S.S.R. We have necessarily great sympathy for the present efforts of the Messina Powers, who are at this moment planning to form a Customs Union among themselves. But because of our interests outside Europe, and in particular our close and mutual trading links with the other countries of the Commonwealth, the United Kingdom itself could not in any circumstances join such a Customs Union; to do so would mean giving up our own tariff and our external trading arrangements.

3. We are therefore, as the Foreign Secretary explained to the Commonwealth Prime Ministers this summer, faced with a dilemma. If the Messina Customs Union is formed with us outside it, it would tend to be a narrow regional bloc, dominated by Germany and our exports to Europe might be squeezed out; Europe would be divided and our economic and indeed political position there might be gravely threatened. On the other hand, if we stand entirely aloof, a movement calculated not only to benefit Europe economically, but to revive it politically, may collapse. We have therefore been giving further thought to how we might be associated with this movement. It goes without saying that our first purpose will be to maintain our association with the Commonwealth.

4. It appears to us that perhaps the right course might be for us to seek together with other countries in Western Europe, particularly Scandinavia, to be associated with the Customs Union in a free trade area over the whole field of trade except food. Broadly, this would mean that over a period of say ten years, we and the other members would undertake reciprocally to reduce, and finally abolish our tariffs on imports of raw materials and manufactured goods from one another within the free trade area; but we should retain our present freedom to maintain, or alter our tariff arrangements with other countries. We should also retain the right to impose non-protective revenue duties. But such arrangements would, so far as we are concerned, be quite inappropriate for agricultural products, and we should make it an unqualified condition that food, including manufactured food, feeding stuffs, drink and tobacco should be excluded from the scope of the area. This exclusion would not enable us to continue our existing agricultural policy, but would also safeguard the existing preferential advantages enjoyed by the great bulk of Commonwealth exports to the United Kingdom. We would not expect the free trade area to include the dependent territories of any of the members, but this would remain uncertain until we found out European reactions to our main proposals and their views on this question; in the meantime, we are consulting our own colonial territories on their possible interest.

5. Arrangements of this kind could, we believe, be of great positive advantage to the Commonwealth as a whole. A politically stable and economically developing Europe should provide an expending market for products of Commonwealth countries, even though they themselves were not members of the area. Moreover, a powerful economic unit should be able to provide capital for investment in Commonwealth countries on a scale greater than the United Kingdom alone could hope to make available. For the United Kingdom itself, a market of 240 million people would present us with very great opportunities. Clearly, we should not be able to take advantage of them unless our industry were on its toes and able to compete effectively, in particular with German industry. But my colleagues and I are convinced that we could and should meet such a challenge. Indeed we must meet it, whatever our trading arrangements.

6. Naturally the success of such a move would depend on the continued adoption and maintenance of strict internal policies in the United Kingdom. But such policies are necessary in any event. Given such internal policies, a move of this kind would strengthen United Kingdom industry and give it both the need and the opportunity to be more thoroughly competitive, not only in Europe, but also in Commonwealth and other foreign markets. The object of such arrangements would be to strengthen the United Kingdom economy and thereby to strengthen sterling and broaden its use as an international currency. They could not in our view, be regarded as a reversal of the policy we have hammered out together in successive Commonwealth meetings. On the contrary, we would regard them as entirely consistent with, and of assistance to, the objects of the collective approach to freer trade and payments, and to convertibility. The whole free trade area would be so large and have so considerable extra-European interests, that there would be no danger of it developing into an inward-looking regional group. It would remain essential for us to pursue and to press others to pursue a policy of non-discrimination in the removal of quota restrictions; and as regards tariffs, though we should progressively be removing our tariffs towards Europe, we should not be required to raise them against others. The general framework of the G.A.T.T. in which reductions of tariffs can be negotiated on a world wide basis would remain central to our commercial policy. We should of course retain the right under existing rules to impose quantitative restrictions for balance of payments reasons to protect sterling. But it is fundamental to our conception that the free trade area in Europe should be created by the removal of trade barriers between its members, and not by the introduction of new barriers against the trade of other countries.

7. Through the exclusion of all foodstuffs from the scope of the free trade area an essential condition on which we should insist without qualification, we should be free to continue the present advantages in this important sector which other Commonwealth countries at present enjoy. For all other goods the United Kingdom would be moving progressively towards according European goods the free entry treatment which the Commonwealth countries already enjoy in the United Kingdom market; and some consequential adjustments arising from guaranteed preference margins in some of our trade agreements with other Commonwealth countries would need consideration. But apart from this we ourselves would wish to carry on with our existing Commonwealth trade agreements and the preferences provided by our tariff against imports from foreign countries outside the free trade area, would not be affected.

8. The creation of a free trade area on these lines would not affect the preponderant part of present Canadian exporters to the United Kingdom; and the United Kingdom would of course, aim to continue the progress which we have made in recent years in reducing and removing quota restrictions on imports from Canada. In tariffs, the United Kingdom would be free to maintain free entry where at present that exists. Food would be unaffected. On raw materials and manufactures, Canada would by the end of the ten year period have lost her present preferences against European producers though her preferences against supplies from the rest of the world including United States of America would be unaffected.

9. The President of the Board of Trade is arranging to join me in Washington at the end of September, and he and I will elaborate these ideas to you when we meet. I must emphasize that we have not yet taken our decisions on these far reaching questions they are not decisions which we could take until we had been able to consult the other countries of the Commonwealth and indeed we are still examining how we might expect them to affect our own economy. Moreover though we expect that proposals of this kind would be well received in Europe we do not know whether all these parts of the proposals to which we would attach the greatest importance would be acceptable, we cannot be sure whether arrangements for a free trade area acceptable to us could be negotiated. Not until a much later date should we be in a position to consider with you the detailed arrangements that such proposals might involve. But I hope that when we have been able to discuss together the broad lines of our idea, you will be able to give some indication how they strike you.[22]

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION — COMMON MARKET PROPOSALS

1. You will now have received the Chancellor of the Exchequer's message to the Minister of Finance, outlining the proposals for the association of the UK with a European free trade area, which UK Ministers hope can be discussed at the Commonwealth Finance Ministers meeting in Washington on Saturday September 29.

2. The President of the Board of Trade asked me to come and see him yesterday. He was supported by Mr. A.R. Low, Minister of State at the Board of Trade, and by Sir Edgar Cohen, who has been acting as Permanent Secretary in Sir Frank Lee's absence. Thorneycroft went over the argument for their proposals which is very clearly set out in Mr. Macmillan's message to Mr. Harris. The Cabinet have not yet committed themselves to the proposals, but they have agreed, after a good deal of heart searching, that Macmillan and Thorneycroft should put them up for consideration at the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' meeting. My judgment is that it represents a long and difficult step forward for a Tory Government to take. The economic reasons for the UK taking this step seem to me to be very strong, and I believe that the political consequences of this new approach from the UK to the continent can be very important.

3. Thorneycroft thinks that the Cabinet support for their policy will be greatly strengthened and the risk of Conservative back bench opposition diminished if other Commonwealth governments feel that they can welcome, or at least say that they can live with, this new development in British international economic policy. In this situation he feels that the general attitude of the Canadian Government towards this new initiative may be of pretty decisive importance. He would particularly like to have an opportunity of discussing his plans informally with Mr. Howe before he introduces them in the larger meeting in Washington and could, if it were convenient to Mr. Howe, arrange to come to Ottawa for this purpose on Wednesday September 26. He could leave here on Tuesday, be in Ottawa Wednesday afternoon, and leave for Washington on Thursday afternoon.

THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE COMMON MARKET

Following for Minister

Following is a draft statement prepared in the Department of finance which Mr. Harris might make at the Washington meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers next week. Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris will be considering this draft statement together today. It would be helpful to have your comments as soon as possible. We will be sending our own views in a separate telegram.

Text begins:

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION
DRAFT STATEMENT FOR MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS IN WASHINGTON

It was only last week, Mr. Chairman, that I received the paper on European Integration which you sent us in advance of this meeting. It raises economic and political issues of the highest importance, and there has been no time to give it concerted Cabinet consideration or even to reach a balanced individual judgment regarding it. Hence what I have to say today must be regarded as preliminary as well as personal. Nevertheless, it may be useful to you and others around this table to know how your proposed new course looks to one pair of Canadian eyes. And let me state immediately that I view it with very mixed feelings — with real appreciation and sympathy and yet not without real apprehension.

2. Both the Prime Minister and also my colleagues Mr. Howe and Mr. Pearson have from time to time made statements relating to European economic integration. These have been made in NATO, in the OEEC, in Commonwealth gatherings, and elsewhere. They have usually expressed two sentiments. On the one hand, they have urged that if some form of European integration were to be sought, it should be achieved by a reduction of internal barriers, not by an increase in external barriers. In the second place, they have warned that, while any new form of preferential treatment can bring the "insiders" closer together, it can scarcely fail to carry with it some increased sense of severance and separation between the "insiders" and the "outsiders". This, of course, has political as well as economic implications.

3. In Canada we have watched with appreciation the emergence, particularly since the last War, of a spirit of European solidarity and community. It was division in Europe, especially division between Germany and the rest, that drew Canada successively into two world wars. Any plans which promise to heal old wounds, and to make the body of Europe whole and strong, must naturally call forth a warm and sympathetic response in my country. And this is especially true now it is so necessary for Europe, including Germany, to stand strong and united against a confusing mixture of threats and enticements from farther to the East.

4. Having said this, I must immediately add that the proposal you have put before us, Mr. Chancellor, differs from other proposals for European economic integration that have been under serious consideration previously, for these have been less ambitious in terms of the countries affected or the commodities covered, or both. Generally they have excluded the United Kingdom, just as they have excluded others around this table and also the United States. The new proposal is, however, that the U.K. should be connected with Europe in a permanent preferential trading area, and area that might be said to discriminate against the whole of the rest of the English-speaking world.

5. Others around this table will, of course, be speaking for themselves. But it may be helpful to say something regarding possible attitudes both in Canada and in the U.S.A. First a word about Canada. On reading your paper I recognized that your exclusion of foods and foodstuffs would mean that, tariff-wise, Canada would be no worse and no better off in this field than at present, and that in such materials as lumber and base metals our position in the U.K. and in Europe would be little worse. Nevertheless, we retain both a small immediate interest and also a larger longer term interest in the U.K. market and even in the European market for manufactured goods, from which we have been so largely shut out since the war. A tariff arrangement favouring all the highly industrialized countries of Europe would, I fear, completely exclude us, and this would be very important to us in terms of the possibilities of diversification of our exports and our export markets.

6. As you may know, Mr. Chairman, there are many in Canada who take a serious view, often a highly exaggerated view, of our alleged dependence on the United States — dependence for markets and dependence for capital. We have been rather scrupulous, recently, not to damage the fabric of our trade relations with other countries and especially with the U.K. I rather fear that proposals on your part to eliminate U.K. preferences in our favour, and indeed to reverse them, might be interpreted as pushing Canada into the arms of the U.S.A.

7. In the U.S.A. itself, there would no doubt be widespread repercussions and ramifications. If the main industrialized countries, other than Russia and Japan, pursue a collective policy of tariff preferences in favour of each other and against the U.S.A. this will surely promote the growth of a sense of isolation in that country; and isolation is likely to breed isolationism. It is true that certain voices in the U.S.A., some of them in the highest places, have given praise and encouragement to plans for European economic integration. Yet I cannot help feeling that this project was easier for them to support when it was relatively small and abstract than it will be when it is broad and concrete. The inclusion of the most powerful and influential country of all in this group to be integrated is likely to make the whole project look considerably different to North American eyes.

8. Both Canada and the U.S.A. would be faced, in the first instance, by a new form of tariff preference against them. But further, I would hazard a guess that the restrictions against dollar imports would, in some European countries at least, be dismantled less rapidly than otherwise. Europe's new economic strength would not develop overnight. Meanwhile, the discomforts of achieving a free trade area would make some European governments doubly reluctant to expose themselves to the discomforts of trans Atlantic competition as well.

9. On the other hand, many features of your paper, Mr. Chancellor, were most welcome. To begin with, as I have said already, we welcome with warmth and sympathy any action that promotes European solidarity. We welcome your assurances that, so far as the U.K. is concerned, trade barriers are to be lowered, not raised; many integration schemes have seemed to be slanted in a different direction. We particularly welcome the restatement of U.K. policy regarding "non-discrimination in the removal of quantitative restrictions" and look forward to the continued support of the U.K. against any others who may be ready to use this excuse to retain or even increase their discriminatory trade restrictions against us. Finally, Mr. Chairman, we welcome the assurance that GATT is still central to U.K. commercial policy. The articles of GATT set forth, of course, accepted conditions for the establishment both of customs unions and free trade areas. We would trust that the full influence of the U.K. would be thrown not only into ensuring that, in principle, any new European arrangement conformed to these conditions but also that, as detailed plans were worked out, the Contracting Parties would be kept informed and given adequate opportunity to make their views known.

10. In conclusion, Mr. Chancellor, I should like to thank you for putting this matter before us. I am sure that all of us welcome this chance for informal and preliminary discussion. We shal! be reporting back to our own Governments the views expressed here and I have no doubt we shall have further and more fully considered views to exchange in the future.

UK ASSOCIATION WITH EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET — DRAFT STATEMENT FOR COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

Following personal for the Minister.

1. Although you will hardly need our comments on the statement drafted for Mr. Harris by Finance, I should like to put forward some supplementary thoughts which have a bearing on the perspective of the draft statement of the Canadian government's position. Partly because it is intentionally so tentative I am afraid that the present draft would be bound to give UK ministers the impression that when it comes to the point Canada is less sympathetic than we had led them to expect both in public and private statements. You may recollect that in your address to the English Speaking Union in London on April 30 you gave a general blessing to U.K. closer association with the Continent.[23] The views Canada will express at the Washington meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers are all the more important to the U.K. because they may influence Australian and New Zealand reactions. From Mr. Robertson's reports and from Mr. Macmillan's message to Mr. Harris it is clear that the U.K. ministers hope for a reasonably sympathetic lead from Canada in the difficult political decision they have taken or are about to take. The Canadian reaction will also carry some weight in Washington where political considerations will also have to be weighed against possible economic losses.

2. Trade and Commerce officials are preparing detailed studies of effect of UK association in European free trade area with common market. Their preliminary conclusion (with respect to the UK only) is that 10% of present Canadian exports would be affected. These are mainly in the fields of semi and highly manufactured goods. In some of these fields however our access to the UK market is also limited by restrictions on dollar imports which we have always hoped would be temporary. These are also the fields in which the US tariff is generally high. At the same time, if Western Europe and the UK are really strengthened economically and politically by the proposed scheme, Canada might eventually gain even in economic terms through ultimately more prosperous markets for our exports, although this might take many years to be felt. In the short term there would be a good deal of discomfort for a number of Canadian industries, although the proposed exclusion of foodstuffs would keep some important Canadian products from being affected.

3. I do not myself see how anyone can quarrel with the general proposition now accepted by the UK that bigger economic units would help Western Europe and UK to compete successfully with mass production potential of USA and USSR. There are many signs of economic weakness in Europe. No doubt Suez crisis is also having important psychological effects as M. Mollet's recent statements testify. Politically there can develop a stronger wish for something closer to a common foreign policy, while economically the need for modernizing industry and finding supplementary power resources in the next decade or so are providing strong incentives for European integration. The UK position will go some way towards removing European hesitations which are still strong; it may be compared, I think, to UK decision to commit itself to station troops in Germany in order to save the wreckage of EDC.

4. I regret we have not had more time to consult you and prepare fuller comments but Mr. Macmillan's message reached us only on September 19 and we did not know until yesterday that Mr. Thorneycroft might visit Ottawa enroute to Washington.

5. In general we share Mr. Robertson's appreciation of this problem chiefly because we feel that in the long run the political factors are so much more important than any other. For this reason, and also because the political and economic ramifications for several Commonwealth countries are so complex, I wonder if, after giving the UK proposal first reading at their meeting next week the Finance Ministers might not consider a second reading later in the year with Foreign and Trade Ministers also present, or perhaps even a Commonwealth economic conference on the subject.

6. I hope to send you tomorrow morning my suggested re-draft of Mr. Harris's statement which I regard as incomplete in its present form.

7. I am repeating this message to Mr. Robertson, hoping also for his comments.

DRAFT CANADIAN STATEMENT FOR COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

Apart from minor editorial changes in Mr. Harris' draft statement on European integration, I would suggest re-writing paragraph 6 and adding a final paragraph as follows:

Paragraph 6. The United States will of course express its own views at an opportune time and these will carry great weight. It is true that certain voices in the U.S.A., some of them in the highest places, have given praise and encouragement to plans for European economic integration. Such plans may have been easier for them to support when they were small and abstract than when they have become strengthened by the adherence of the U.K. and perhaps other OEEC members. If the main industrialized countries, other than U.S.S.R. and Japan, pursue a collective policy of tariff preferences in favour of each other, (and to that extent against the U.S.A.), is there any danger that the growth of a sense of isolation in that country might be promoted? You will no doubt have made a calculation of the probable U.S. reaction, and I think it would be useful if we could compare notes on what will certainly be one of the key factors in this new situation.

Final paragraph. In the meantime I can assure you that the political and economic objectives of this extremely important and indeed bold proposal are appreciated by my government. The Canadian government is of course willing to consider any scheme whereby the U.K. would be associating itself more closely with the other countries of Western Europe for any increase in the collective strength, prosperity and welfare of that area of the world is our gain. At the same time I am sure you appreciate how carefully a Canadian government must study the implications of this proposal for Canada's external trade and the structure of the Canadian economy. I can assure you that we will undertake this study with a sympathetic understanding of the motives which have led you to put forward these ideas and a full recognition of the important political objectives you have in mind — objectives which we naturally share. Ends.

UK ASSOCIATION WITH EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET — DRAFT STATEMENT FOR COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

I have read with much interest your comments on the proposed statement from the Minister of Finance. I feel that we should be as forthcoming and sympathetic as possible in our reaction to the UK move and that we should not let the possibility of immediate Canadian difficulties obscure the short range political and the longer range economic advantages of this development. That is why I feel that paragraph 6, as rewritten, and the final paragraph improve the draft statement. I have been in touch with Mr. Robertson by telephone and will be discussing the matter with him again this evening after which he also will be sending you a message.

UK AND THE COMMON MARKET

I had a word with Mr. Pearson in Paris last night about your messages and at his suggestion am amplifying the points made in his telegram NATO 2002. My telegram 1281 emphasized how much importance the government here attach to the first reaction of other Commonwealth countries to the free trade area scheme. This is because a favourable Commonwealth reaction is needed to strengthen the hands of the government with their own supporters and indeed, with all segments of public opinion in this country if they are really going to go ahead with their policy.

2. There is no doubt that the UK are hoping for a lead to come from Canada at the forthcoming consultations in Washington. We are, after all, more closely concerned with Europe than any other Commonwealth country both through our NATO membership and through our association with the OEEC. As such, we should be in a better position than other Commonwealth countries to assess the strength of the political factors which have prompted the UK to throw in their weight with a common market in Europe. We have also, of course, taken a rather more pragmatic view than others of the value of Commonwealth preference and to that extent might be expected to accept more readily some modification of the trading advantages available to us in the UK market.

3. The fact of the matter is that the adjustments which may be required on the part of Commonwealth countries are only one element in the free trade area scheme. By far the more difficult and far reaching adjustments will, after all, be required in the domestic economy of this country. The proponents of the free trade area association with Europe see it as a means of forcing the UK to make herself more competitive. Indeed, the whole assumption on which UK participation in a free trade area scheme (in common with her major competitor, Germany) is based, is that British industry will learn, as Mr. Macmillan put it in his message, to get "on its toes and .... compete effectively". Needless to say, this will involve fundamental adjustments not only in production processes but in attitudes towards competition throughout industry in this country.

4. It is important to recognize that the free trade area association is not the "easy way out" for this country. It has its risks because nobody can say confidently how the different sectors of the economy will respond to this new challenge. This being so, I would think that our statement should show some recognition of the bold and imaginative nature of the action which the UK is preparing itself to take.

5. In its present form, our draft statement refers to the danger that "the discomforts of achieving a free trade area might make some European governments doubly reluctant to expose themselves to the discomforts of trans Atlantic competition as well". My own feeling is that a Europe that has been exposed to the forces of competition internally is much less likely to regard with apprehension the spectre of competition from across the Atlantic. Moreover, the removal of internal tariff barriers in Europe is bound to generate pressures in each country to have access to the best and cheapest equipment and materials with which to meet competition within the area. I would expect, therefore, that as time goes on the present artificial barriers to trade in Europe will come to be regarded as less rather than more necessary.

6. I also feel that we must accept as genuine the British contention that the free trade area solution is not only consistent with but actually "of assistance to the objects of the collective approach .... and to convertibility". We know that the UK will not move to convertibility unless sterling is strong and sterling is unlikely to be really strong unless the underlying position of the economy can be strengthened. The progressive injection of large doses of genuine competition is, in my view, a factor that offers greater promise than any other of strengthening the British economy. To the extent that the UK participation in a European common market would do just that, it is more likely to help than to hinder progress in the direction of ultimate convertibility. It is not a matter of coincidence, therefore, there is an overwhelming case for a sympathetic Canadian response to the British approach. If our response were to be too guarded at this stage, we might risk killing the scheme and I assume that we have no wish to do so. If on the other hand, we were to welcome the scheme as the momentous step in the direction of a stronger Europe which it could be, we would have many opportunities, both before the free trade area comes into being and as it evolves over the next decade or so, of influencing the form of the scheme in the direction best calculated to serve and protect our interests.

8. Over the weekend I have had an opportunity of comparing notes with the Economic Minister at the American Embassy (Win Brown) and I gather that his general reporting to Washington on these developments is very closely in line with ours. The Americans, I think, are likely to welcome this initiative from the UK without in any way giving up their long run interests in getting rid of European dollar discrimination.

UK AND THE COMMON MARKET

The final paragraph which you propose to have added to Mr. Harris' draft statement is very much along the lines I had in mind and should serve to put to whole statement in much better prospective.

2. I am not yet persuaded, however, that paragraph 6, even as redrafted, would serve any useful purpose. There is some danger, I think, in our attempting to predict the American reaction to the free trade area proposals, especially since we may not be giving full weight to the extent to which the Americans could already be said to have come out in favour of a really effective scheme for European integration.

3. I understand that the British have now broached their proposals to the Americans and Macmillan and Thorneycroft would, no doubt, wish to inform their Commonwealth colleagues of the results of their consultations with the Americans if there were anything of interest to report by the time of the Finance Ministers' meeting.

CANADIAN STATEMENT FOR COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING

We were grateful for the opportunity your telegram to the Minister afforded of reading your suggested rewriting of paragraph 6 and your suggested final paragraph.

2. We consider your redraft of paragraph 6 to be a great improvement over that contained in the original draft statement which was expressed in too quibbling and rather provocative form.

3. As regards the proposed final paragraph we think it should be judged in relation to the difficult period of negotiations which lies ahead in GATT and other forums. We do not think the Canadian government should go too far towards giving the UK a blank cheque in advance of these negotiations. Moreover, the final paragraph, particularly the last sentence, is somewhat hypocritical. A recognition of the important political objectives is not the principal motive which has induced the UK to put forward these ideas as stated in the final sentence. As their own statement indicates they are putting forward the proposals for a free trade area in self defence because they could not contemplate the discrimination against British trade which a customs union without UK associated would have involved. Their approach, therefore, is a purely pragmatic one. It might prejudice our position in the future if we flatter them by crediting higher motives such as recognition of the important political objectives which a short time ago they were decrying.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET AND FREE TRADE AREA — MR. HOWE'S CONVERSATION WITH MR. THORNEYCROFT

Mr. Thorneycroft saw Mr. Howe this afternoon and presented the case for United Kingdom participation in a European Free Trade Area on lines very similar to those contained in the Chancellor's message to Mr. Harris.

2. Mr. Howe explained that he had not had an opportunity to consider Mr. Macmillan's memorandum thoroughly or to discuss it with his Cabinet colleagues. He realized that Canada could not be neutral on the large issues involved. He also knew that an arrangement of the kind which the United Kingdom was now contemplating might have very great political value. He thought Mr. Thorneycroft would appreciate that such an arrangement would create domestic problems in Canada as it would in the United Kingdom; in particular it might lead to the criticism that the Ottawa Preferential Agreements were being scrapped. In addition it might affect United States-Canadian relations very substantially and throw Canada even more into the arms of the United States. The Canadian Government naturally would consider the proposal very carefully and would let the United Kingdom Government have its views as soon as possible.

3. These exchanges were followed by a very interesting discussion on some of the technical problems involved (for example, the method of determining "origin" of goods entering into trade in the Area, the rules to govern the use of quotas or quantitative restrictions inside the Area and possibly outside as well, the likelihood of private cartels taking the place of tariffs in controlling trade among the participants). One of the most interesting points made by Thorneycroft in this discussion had to do with the intentions of the United Kingdom with respect to goods which are now subject to duty even when imported from Canada or other Commonwealth sources. Clearly when the Free Trade Area comes fully into being these goods, like all others, will be admitted without duty from other countries in the Area. If the old duties continued to be charged on Commonwealth goods the United Kingdom would in effect be discriminating against Commonwealth countries in favour of the participants in the arrangement (even though Commonwealth countries might still receive a preference over non-Commonwealth countries outside the Area). Mr. Thorneycroft emphasized that it was not the purpose of the United Kingdom Government to discriminate against Canada or other Commonwealth members in this manner, and that the United Kingdom would be prepared to have discussions or negotiations on particular items with the Commonwealth countries affected. This would obviously be of some help in getting acceptance of the whole scheme in commercial circles in Canada. It would not of course get over the opposition of industries mainly interested in European markets other than that of the United Kingdom, since those European countries might not be as ready to negotiate on particular items.

4. Throughout the discussion this afternoon Mr. Thorneycroft placed a good deal of emphasis on the timing of the United Kingdom's participation in the proposed arrangement. If the United Kingdom delayed and endeavoured to come in only at a later stage, it would no doubt have to make concessions to the Europeans which might involve injury to Canada and other outside countries. Moreover, the United Kingdom would not then have an opportunity to influence the general character of the arrangement. From all points of view it seemed desirable that if the United Kingdom was going to join the Free Trade Area it should take an active part from the beginning.

5. I would judge that generally the talk with Mr. Thorneycroft had a good effect on Mr. Howe and on the officials present (i.e. Messrs. Bull, Sharp, Isbister, Taylor and Bryce). The further consideration of the United Kingdom proposal in Ottawa is likely to be assisted considerably by this afternoon's discussion. A further talk on the details of the proposed arrangement is expected to take place to-morrow morning among the United Kingdom and Canadian officials concerned with trade and financial questions.

EUROPEAN CUSTOMS UNION/FREE-TRADE AREA — MR. THORNEYCROFT'S INTERVIEW WITH THE PRIME MINISTER

According to Mr. Bryce the Prime Minister will arrive only a few minutes before he sees Mr. Thorneycroft shortly after twelve o'clock this morning. There will, therefore, be little time for Mr. St. Laurent to read any papers before the interview. Mr. Bryce has undertaken, however, to give the Prime Minister orally an outline of the Chancellor's message, Mr. Harris's proposed statement, Mr. Pearson's suggested amendments, and an indication of the relevant political and economic arguments. His expectation is that at this stage the Prime Minister will wish to be fairly non-committal.

2. From a conversation with Mr. Sharp last evening I understand that Mr. Howe and Mr. Harris have talked on the phone about the last paragraph of the latter's proposed statement and that Mr. Harris has indicated his intention to stick to his original "neutral" text rather than use the more favourable language which we had suggested and which Mr. Pearson had approved. Mr. Howe did not apparently press Mr. Harris to be more forthcoming. If Mr. Pearson feels that more should be said he may wish to call Mr. Harris in Washington before Friday. Mr. Pearson might wish to urge Mr. Harris to welcome more warmly this politically significant move of the United Kingdom in the direction of Europe, while at the same time reserving our freedom to discuss particular features with them and the other participants as the preparations proceed for this or some other kind of arrangement between the United Kingdom and Europe. It should be possible to pay a tribute to the United Kingdom and show an appreciation of the political value which this development can have, without appearing to bless this particular scheme in detail and without weakening significantly our bargaining position for any negotiations which may be required.

3. If Mr. Pearson decides to follow this up with Mr. Harris he may also wish to discuss the position with Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Howe beforehand. The matter may, of course, come up in Cabinet this afternoon.

4. An alternative to pressing Mr. Harris on this matter now would be to let the present non-committal or slightly negative statement be made in the private meeting in Washington and work towards an early public statement of a more sympathetic or favourable character. The risk in this alternative is, of course, that the United Kingdom may receive such negative reactions from the United States, and from some of the Commonwealth representatives at Friday meeting, that they may lose heart if we do not speak up appreciatively — or they may lose some of their interest in our views.

PROPOSED STATEMENT BY MR. HARRIS AT THE MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS CONCERNING THE EUROPEAN FREE-TRADE AREA — CUSTOMS UNION

Mr. Harris is apparently not inclined to alter the last paragraph in his draft statement. He considers that it would be desirable to end on a rather non-committal and pedestrian note. I attach a copy of Mr. Harris's original draft for reference purposes.

2. You will recall that we had suggested a more positive and favourable concluding paragraph; a copy of our draft is also attached.

3. You may wish to speak with Mr. Harris in Washington on this matter or you may think it desirable to raise the question in Cabinet this afternoon. In this connection we understand that Mr. Howe is in general agreement with the approach adopted by Mr. Harris.

4. In case it does not prove possible to get acceptance of something along the lines of our earlier draft of the final paragraph you may think it would be sufficient for present purposes to secure the agreement of your colleagues to a compromise draft which officials produced this morning, a copy of which is attached. This compromise retains the bulk of Mr. Harris's text but brings in a sentence in the middle which recognizes the boldness of the tentative United Kingdom proposal and the importance of its political and economic objectives.

Possible Compromise Text

8. I must emphasize again the preliminary nature of the comments and questions I have touched on. We shall give your proposal earnest study. In the meantime, I can assure you that the political and economic objectives of this extremely important, and indeed bold, proposal are fully appreciated by my Government. I am sure that all of us welcome this chance for informal and exploratory discussion. We shall be reporting back to our own Governments the views expressed here and I have no doubt we shall have further and more fully considered views to exchange in the future.

MR. HARRIS'S PROPOSED STATEMENT ON THE FREE-TRADE AREA — CUSTOMS UNION

I was told at lunch time that Mr. Howe had been shown a copy of the compromise draft of the last paragraph and that he had indicated his somewhat reluctant agreement with it. This information has been passed on to Mr. McGill in the Minister's Office in order that the Minister might be aware of Mr. Howe's attitude before any discussion in Cabinet. It would presumably still be desirable for the Minister to speak with Mr. Harris if the latter is to be persuaded to accept a somewhat more positive ending to his statement than that which it contains at present.

Mr. Bryce also mentioned at noon time that he had found Mr. St. Laurent quite sympathetic with the United Kingdom proposal. Mr. Bryce had the impression that the Prime Minister's present views are probably rather closer to those of this Department than to those of Finance and Trade and Commerce. Mr. St. Laurent was nevertheless quite restrained in commenting to Mr. Thorneycroft as he felt that definite Canadian Government views might better be expressed at a later date.

EUROPEAN FREE TRADE AREA; POSSIBLE UNITED KINGDOM MEMBERSHIP

16. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that the President of the Board of Trade of the United Kingdom had visited Ottawa to explain his government's views on the establishment of a free trade area in Europe embracing, as its nucleus, a customs union now being proposed by the Benelux group, France, Germany, and Italy, to which the United Kingdom and other countries might adhere. The U.K. would propose that agriculture products should be excluded from the free trade arrangement. He wished to obtain the Canadian government's views on the suggestion of the U.K. joining the new association should a practical plan emerge. The U.K. would welcome Canadian support for its proposal but Mr. Howe thought it would be a mistake to make a stand in support of this at this time because the plan was so complicated that nothing might come of it. Furthermore, the implications for Canada were as yet not at all clear.

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said a U.K. decision to join the free trade area was a most important one from the European standpoint. The practical difficulties were very great but, if the U.K. became a member, the political problems of the European countries concerned would be made appreciably simpler. Even so, the French economic situation, for example, would present an almost insurmountable barrier to working out an acceptable arrangement. Frankly, he doubted if the plan would be successful. Nevertheless, as sympathetic a reaction as possible to the U.K. sounding, both from Canada and other Commonwealth nations, was desirable. If this were not forthcoming and the project collapsed, it would be tempting for the U.K. to lay the cause for failure on the Commonwealth's doorstep.

18. During the discussion the following points emerged:

(a) The establishment of a European free trade area could mean the loss of markets for some Canadian products and lessen the possibility of gaining or regaining U.K. markets for other goods in the future. For the government to give its support to a plan which might lead to such a result, and point up Canada's dependence on other markets, would be embarrassing. On the other hand, it could also be said that successful free trade arrangements would make a much stronger and more prosperous Europe in which there would open up great possibilities for Canadian trade.

(b) It would be unwise to indicate outright support for the plan at this stage. However, the U.K. was about to canvass Commonwealth views at a meeting of finance ministers in Washington and the Canadian attitude should not be entirely negative. Perhaps it could be said that the concept was a bold one and that anything which increased the prosperity and strength of Europe was all to the good. However, the implications of the proposals were far reaching and had to be studied carefully.

(c) A major source of difficulty would be re-arrangements in the Commonwealth preferences which would have to be made on the U.K. joining the plan. The President of the Board of Trade had said the U.K. would not grant preferences to European countries against Canada. However, it was not clear at present what the outcome would be.

19. The Cabinet noted the reports of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the proposal of the United Kingdom to join in the creation of a European free trade area, and agreed that the Canadian reaction at this stage should be cautious, that the United Kingdom be informed at the Washington meeting that the economic and political purposes of this important step in trade policy were appreciated by Canada, but there were many implications of the proposal which would have to be studied carefully.

Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance to Head, Economic Division

Ottawa, October 1, 1956

Dear Ed [Ritchie]:

I attach a copy of the statement[24] prepared for use by Mr. Harris at the meeting of the Commonwealth Finance Ministers in Washington two days ago.

As I explained to you a few minutes ago over the telephone, this text contains a number of changes that were introduced on Friday evening (after I had spoken to you over the telephone) when Mr. Harris went through the earlier draft in detail. Further, as I mentioned to you, Mr. Harris did not read paragraphs 1 and 2 but instead spoke extemporaneously in relation to the subjects which they cover.

We shall be receiving the Minutes of the meeting† from Washington very shortly, probably tomorrow.

At the meeting on Saturday the United Kingdom circulated a new piece of paper† and invited questions. I enclose the copy which I had in the meeting. You will see from the Minutes that we raised quite a number of points in relation to it.

Finally I enclose for your information, in case you want to go over the ground on a blow-by-blow basis, a copy of our draft statement[25] as it existed when you and I were talking together on the telephone, i.e. after we had had a long talk with Claude Isbister but before Mr. Harris himself had gone over the paper in detail.

Yours sincerely,

EUROPEAN INTEGRATION
STATEMENT FOR MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS IN WASHINGTON

It was only last week that I received the paper on European Integration which you sent us in advance of this meeting. It raises economic and political issues of the highest importance, and there has been no time to give it concerted Cabinet consideration or even to reach a balanced individual judgment regarding it. Hence what I have to say today must be regarded as preliminary as well as personal.

2. In Canada we have watched with deep interest the emergence, particularly since the last War, of a spirit of European solidarity and community. It was division in Europe, especially division between Germany and the rest, that drew Canada successively into two world wars. Any plans which are intended to heal old wounds, and to make the body of Europe whole and strong within the multilateral system of international trade to which we are all committed, must naturally call forth a warm and sympathetic response in my country.

3. Both the Prime Minister and also my colleagues Mr. Howe and Mr. Pearson have from time to time made statements relating to various aspects of European economic integration. The powerful motives inspiring the idea are appreciated. Further, you have said that integration should be achieved by the removal of internal barriers not by an increase in external barriers. At the same time you will expect me to point out that, while any new form of preferential treatment can bring the "insiders" closer together, it can scarcely fail to carry with it some increased sense of severance and separation between the "insiders" and the "outsiders".

4. As for Canada, we shall, of course, be studying what may happen to our trade with the United Kingdom including the implications for the British Preferential System. We shall

[25] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
dated Sept. 28th [A.F.W. Plumptre] be considering our exports to the United Kingdom and Europe both of raw materials and of manufactured goods; nor shall we be able to exclude possible developments in the field of agriculture.

5. As you may know, there are many in Canada who take a serious view, often a highly exaggerated view, of our alleged economic dependence on the United States. It would be necessary for us, therefore, to give a great deal of thought to proposals for a new and large-scale European preferential system which might add to this concern.

6. The United States will I suppose express its own views at an opportune time. It is true that certain voices in the United States, some of them in the highest places, have given praise and encouragement to plans for European economic integration. However, if the main industrialized countries of Europe pursue a collective policy of tariff preferences in favour of each other (and to that extent against the United States) is there any danger that the growth of a sense of isolation in that country might be promoted?

7. The statement you sent us referred to our "collective approach to freer trade and payments" and I was glad to note your opinion that the proposals you are now putting before us are consistent with, and of assistance to, the objects of that approach. Nevertheless I still wonder whether the restrictions against dollar imports might, in some European countries at least, be dismantled less rapidly than otherwise. Europe's new economic strength would not develop overnight. Meanwhile, the discomforts of achieving a free trade area might make some European governments doubly reluctant to expose themselves to the discomforts of trans-Atlantic competition as well.

8. I must emphasize again the preliminary nature of the comments and questions I have touched on. We shall give your proposal earnest study. In the meantime, I can assure you that the political and economic objectives of this extremely important, and indeed bold, proposal are fully recognized by my Government. We welcome this chance for informal and exploratory discussion.

1. Mr. Plumptre gave a report of the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers held in Washington on Saturday, September 29th, 1956. He said that the Right Honourable Peter Thorneycroft, Chairman of the U.K. Board of Trade, had started the meeting by giving somewhat the same exposé which he had given in Ottawa. The Commonwealth finance ministers had expressed their views about the proposed plan. The New Zealand finance minister had said that he had been informed of the proposals only recently. Personally he was favourably disposed towards it, particularly since agricultural products would be excluded. He had asked that the details be given with more precision. In general it could be said that the New Zealand attitude was typical of the normal support it gave the United Kingdom.

The Australian representatives had seemed to be slightly more reserved in their approval of the U.K. proposals. On the whole however, the tone of the Australian comments could be judged to be sympathetic to the plan.

The Indian representatives had begun with fairly general remarks which seemed to favour the proposals. They had raised a few specific questions which were of particular interest to India. Investment problems had been stressed at previous meetings and this might have prompted the Indians to enquire whether European investments would not be diverted away from India as a result of the creation of a Free Trade Area. In reply to the Indian representatives' question Mr. Thorneycroft had said that the programme was intended to strengthen the European economy and thus increase the aggregate funds available for investment abroad. The Indians had asked whether U.K. dependent territories, in which they had important markets, would be included in the plan for a free trade area. Mr. Thorneycroft had answered that these territories were being canvassed for their opinions but he expected they would want to opt out.

2. Mr. Taylor said that Sir Edgar Cohen, a member of the U.K.'s delegation, had left him with a different impression. Sir Edgar had remarked that France would probably want to include its dependent territories in the proposed Customs Union. If this happened Belgium would want the Belgian Congo included and the U.K. might be driven to follow the same course in respect of its dependent territories. It would be an awkward problem in any event.

3. Mr. Plumptre said that the Indians made it clear that they did not want the system of Commonwealth preferences impaired. They said that if the Ottawa system was modified, the whole question of preferences would have to be reviewed.

4. Mr. Isbister said the Indians wanted it understood that they were at least as free as the British. They were very much concerned about existing preferences in U.K. dependent territories. They considered the U.K. market a dwindling asset or at least one in which they could not expand their exports. They were, therefore, very much concerned about the markets in the dependent territories. He had the feeling that this concern had not been removed by U.K. assurances.

5. Mr. Plumptre went on to say that the Pakistan representative had expressed sympathy for the plan in general. He also raised the problem of regional development. The Ceylon representative had spoken briefly and said that, judging by the statements he had heard, he thought Ceylon's commercial interests seemed to be protected. The Ceylon representative noted what the Indians had said and added that he would want to study the proposals in detail. Rhodesia and Nyasaland expressed general interest in the proposals and said that they would want to make a commodity by commodity study of the proposals.

6. Mr. Plumptre said that Mr. Harris had spoken much along the lines of his prepared text. However, he had spoken extemporaneously at first and the minutes were not an accurate reflection of what he had said. Mr. Harris had spoken of the desirability of any programme which would heal the wounds of Europe, but he had not said, as was reported in the minutes, that the proposals would heal these wounds. Moreover, the minutes made no reference to his statement about "insiders and outsiders".

7. Mr. Plumptre added that, at the morning meeting, the U.K. had circulated a paper which, in his opinion, seemed to have been put together hurriedly. It prompted a few questions by the Canadian delegates. Paragraph 5 of the paper made mention of quotas in the Free Trade Area. Canadian delegates had thought that discussions of the FTA proposals would be confined to tariff questions and were surprised to find quotas mentioned in the paper. The U.K. representatives said that the U.K. did not want a free trade area to go into effect while a residual quota system was being maintained. The U.K. had proposed that the removal of quotas within Europe would be completed in about a decade.

8. Mr. Rasminsky added that, according to U.K. statements, any proposals to remove quotas would not subtract from but add to the obligations of the European members in GATT. The implications of the U.K. proposals on this matter were that balance of payment quotas under GATT waivers would be progressively reduced and that this process would be non-discriminatory.

9. Mr. Plumptre said that the final paragraph of the circulated paper referred to a European administrative organization for the FTA. This proposal had not been foreseen by Canada and it led the Canadian delegates to wonder if it would not undermine GATT.

10. Mr. Rasminsky said that Mr. Thorneycroft had explained this proposal by saying that the U.K. did not want to have anything to do with a supranational authority. Every party to the agreement would act independently but a general supervisory body would be created with no executive functions.

11. Mr. Hockin said that, in his discussions with the U.K. delegates, he had been assured that OEEC would continue to function but it had not been resolved how far the proposed FTA administrative organization would expand. In any event, the U.K. wanted to be free to manage sterling.

12. Mr. Plumptre, in answer to Mr. Bryce's question, said that he had a feeling that the U.K. delegates left the Washington meeting with the belief that most of the Commonwealth countries would approve the proposals. He pointed out that the question of timing was left unresolved. But the U.K. government, he thought, must reach a decision by mid-October since OEEC was planning to publish, in December, a working group's report dealing with the relationship between the proposed Customs Union and member countries not taking part therein. This suggested timing for the U.K. would necessitate Canada formulating its views in a general way within 10 days or so.

13. Mr. Rasminsky said that within the near future the U.K. was planning to raise officially with the U.S. the question of FTA.

Mr. Rasminsky emphasized the importance of the questions raised by India. The exclusion of agricultural commodities from FTA would safeguard some Indian interest but would leave unresolved problems relating to such commodities as cotton, jute, etc. These problems would likely lead India to request a review of the whole question of preferences.

14. Mr. Ritchie felt that India's position was some distance short of outright objection to the plan even though she would want the details carefully examined.

15. Mr. Isbister believed that one's appraisal of the success or failure of the U.K. ministers at this meeting would depend upon one's assumption regarding their initial objectives. If it is assumed that they hoped to obtain explicit approval from the Commonwealth, then they failed. If, on the other hand, they hoped mainly to neutralize the other Commonwealth countries so as to avoid public criticism of the proposals, then they succeeded. From conversations with U.K. representatives in Ottawa, it would appear that the U.K. objectives were along the second of the above courses.

16. Mr. Rasminsky agreed. He believed U.K. ministers would feel that the problems raised could be worked out reasonably well.

17. Mr. Taylor said he understood Canadian ministers were worried about the U.K. proposal on two grounds. On the one hand, many in Canada might feel that future export opportunities in some fields were being curtailed. On the other, if the government appeared to be too encouraging in its response many would feel that Canada cared little if the U.K. "left" the Commonwealth.

18. Mr. Rasminsky thought the points raised by Canada concerning "insiders" and "outsiders" and the dangers of failure should be of concern to the United Kingdom.

19. Mr. Isbister recalled that Mr. Thorneycroft had expressed the hope that the Ottawa Agreements would continue. Implicitly however it was recognized that there would have to be a rearrangement of preferences.

20. Mr. Rasminsky said that the meeting had left him with two general impressions. He thought that the British ministers had decided to go ahead with the FTA. It would be helpful to the U.K. to get the support of the Commonwealth but their decision to go ahead would not be affected by vague objections. Although a case was made out by the British that the FTA was based on economic reasons, he thought that fundamentally this was a political move which was urged by the position of the U.K. in the world today. The FTA was one aspect of an effort to create a Third Force.

21. Mr. Taylor said that his impression was that the FTA proposals were based on both political and economic reasons. It was in part a move to contain Germany. He was not sure whether the FTA was intended to scuttle Messina or whether the British regarded the Messina plan inevitable and felt they could not afford to stay out.

22. Mr. Plumptre suggested that this might be an effort by the U.K. to control Messina.

23. Mr. Bryce said that his impression was that the U.K. did not dare to be left out of what was happening in continental Europe.

24. Mr. Ritchie said that there was some doubt that Messina could be a success without U.K. participation. He thought that the British could not very well think that the success of Messina was inevitable.

25. Mr. Rasminsky said the U.K. were faced with the following dilemma. If Messina became a success without U.K. participation, the British would be the losers. If the Messina initiative failed there would be unfavourable political results and the breakdown would lead to a "Balkanization of Europe".

26. Mr. Isbister said that the British realized that by supporting Messina they strengthened it immeasurably and could exercise more control over it.

27. Mr. Bryce expressed the view of the meeting by saying that the British intended to go ahead with FTA unless strong disapproval was voiced. He asked the meeting whether it thought the FTA plan, as outlined by the U.K., would succeed.

28. Mr. Léger wondered what would happen if the British did not participate in the Free Trade Area. What were the alternatives over the next 10 years?

29. Mr. Taylor said that it was his view that if the British did not proceed, the Messina plan would never succeed or something much worse might materialize.

30. Mr. Plumptre said he had many doubts that the FTA as proposed by the British would succeed. Success for the U.K. would depend largely on whether she could compete with the Continent and with Germany in particular. The British would need a great measure of self-control and it was difficult to feel at all sure that they would be able to maintain continuity of policy in this connection over the next five or ten years. The issue was whether it was advisable for Canada to appraise openly the U.K.'s capability to meet the challenge inherent in the FTA plan.

31. Mr. Rasminsky thought it would be inadvisable to oppose the plan publicly. If Canadian opposition were expressed we would be assuming political responsibility with regard to an important European matter and we should not put ourselves in that position. As regards the plan itself his skepticism about it related to an appreciation of the likelihood of the European nations ever, in fact, reaching the goal they hoped to attain. If all tariff barriers were abolished and the necessary adjustments made at once, and Europe were thus much stronger, Canada's interests would be served. But the adjustments would be very painful. Could the European nations concerned accumulate the necessary savings? Could they maintain exports? Could they implement strict internal policies? If any one country got into difficulties wouldn't the weak tend to weaken the strong in the group? All these questions made him doubt if the plan could be made workable, and if the objective were only partially attained the situation might be worse than before.

32. Mr. Lamontagne said it was difficult for Canada to remain neutral. He wondered what alternative Canada could suggest.

33. Mr. Sharp said that the alternative was for European countries to reduce their trade barriers against the rest of the world. This would strengthen Europe more than the plan under consideration. It assumed, however, that the U.S. would give leadership and support to a multilateral trading world. But Europe did not have the confidence to take these bold steps.
